2002

Her Still Singing Limbs: A Collection of Poetry

Anthony William Rintala
Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College, arinta1@lsu.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.lsu.edu/gradschool_theses Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
https://digitalcommons.lsu.edu/gradschool_theses/2664

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at LSU Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in LSU Master's Theses by an authorized graduate school editor of LSU Digital Commons. For more information, please contact gradetd@lsu.edu.
Rintala, Anthony William, B.A., University of Southern Louisiana, 1997 Major: Creative Writing
Her Still Singing Limbs: A Collection of Poetry
Thesis directed by Professor Rodger Kamenetz

ABSTRACT

Her Still Singing Limbs: A Collection of Poetry is a fragmented rumination on the intrinsic loneliness of the human condition. Using the Greek myth of Echo’s destruction at her beloved Narcissus’s hands as the foundation, these poems combine voyeuristic images of beauty and violence to explain why all poets write “songs of exquisite loneliness.”
HER STILL SINGING LIMBS: A COLLECTION OF POETRY

A Thesis
Submitted to the Graduate Faculty of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Fine Arts

in

The Department of English

by
Anthony William Rintala
B.A., University of Southern Mississippi, 1997 August, 2002
Acknowledgements

My love first goes to those women, beginning with my mother, who let me tear them apart to put myself together. But most of all to Amy, who I broke my hands against. You are the sound of my own voice echoing back to me, forever.

I also want to offer my appreciation to my mentors, who trusted what I had to say before they read a page. Thank you, Rodger. Thank you, Rick. Thank you, Joe. This book would never have come to be without your tireless guidance.

Gratitude also goes to those who taught me that the writing is more important than the hand. It was a lesson I couldn’t afford not to learn.

A toast toward the four points of the compass. To Elizabeth Bishop, who drew me a shape. To Wallace Stevens, who gave me the words. To William Shakespeare, who taught me how they combine. To Sage Francis, who directed the house lights onto the audience; I had forgotten.

To my father who read “The Land of Counterpane” while I was wrapped in my own: this is all your fault.

To Kendra and Trey, my students and peers.

To my friends, who know your own names, and understand everything about me except the poetry.

To Manny, who is alone so that I never have to be. One of us is lost in Omelas, the other locked out; we’ll decide who’s who when we meet at the gate.
Table of Contents

Acknowledgements ................................................................. ii Abstract ...................................................................................... v Arthur Murray Crab ................................................................. 1
Her Still Singing Limbs .............................................................. 3 Eyes Closed ............................................................................... 5
The Lizard .................................................................................. 7
Nude Words (from a photograph) ............................................... 9 Quibron (500mg) ........................................................................ 11
The Ghost .................................................................................... 13
Lost City: Landscape in Miniature .............................................. 15 Light .......................................................................................... 17
Lake Erie Blues .......................................................................... 18
Something Like Music ............................................................... 20
The Butterfly .............................................................................. 21
Flutterbye ................................................................................... 23
Sears .......................................................................................... 25
From the AWP Conference (March, 2002) .................................. 27 Venusian .................................................................................... 29 irReflective ............................................................................... 31 Expression .................................................................................. 33
Abstract

Her Still Singing Limbs: A Collection of Poetry is a fragmented rumination on the intrinsic loneliness of the human condition. Using the Greek myth of Echo’s destruction at her beloved Narcissus’s hands as the foundation, these poems combine voyeuristic images of beauty and violence to explain why all poets write “songs of exquisite loneliness.” Beyond where this stretch of beach is blanched and locked in headlights, the gulf applauds with the shore in the surrounding night.
The beams scoop tunnels toward where the land collides again with water pulsing unseen in the dark, curling up to eclipse the shore, nuzzle at the mirrored facets of reflective sand, and fall back.

From this division, one shell jitters into the light. Rising and falling on sharpened ballerina toes, the rounded, low crab dances up-beach in the intersection of thrown headlights.
Illumination then bathes the man as he steps into a slow minuet with the clawed dancer, his bare feet compressing the sand as they circle each other like echoes.

Three pale faces blurred behind a windshield watch the waltz. The woman laughs as her husband pirouettes before the low white shell, setting it to swirl, scuttle, feint, sidestep and snap.

Claws raise high to grasp the man’s shoulders and lead him away. They move together like fire, throwing sparks of sand up into a breeze that billows and tears the grains into smoke. Wild shadows flare from the legs of the dancers and escape into the undulating abyss beyond.

The man dances, back turned to his family, leaning down, body writhing into the shadows to this new embrace.

The wife turns off the lights but the night does not flood fast enough over the shore. Her children still see the straining mouth and inhuman eyes of their father as he lifts his torn heel from the single, shattered claw stabbing up from the white sand. Pitch beads of blood fall around it, miniature oceans absorbing the light.
Fragments of echoes immured in the Earth (rising in twists through the air and foundering beneath waters pulled wild by the perambulations of the moon) cry out still, wailing to be heard.

Loneliness isn’t a bloody business like birth; it’s the dry sundering of split wood, reverberating with the fingerbone shatter of branches.
It is the gasp of an axe moving air and the shriek it drives into the trunk.

Osiris only made fourteen walnut logs planted down the Nile. Echo went farther.
She is every wall, crying out in tandem with forlorn calls, resounding lonesome cries.
She is every flat surface that reflects.

She is in the shout of the box spring frame and the ceiling shadows moved by passing headlights; split so fine, she is the axe handle, too, moaning with every lovely chop.

If we all cried out as one, expelled the truth wedged so long in lungs, and sang the ancient song first put to reed by the nymph held down, torn apart by loved hands, the echoes that would come back from man-made walls and heavens, would shatter the eyes reflected in water.
Eyes Closed

Enclosed in layers of house while the rain scrubs the outside naked and entranced in dark blankets I close eyes listen to the air shake itself clean seconds after lightning flashes the world stark beautiful nude female flesh in the shower I hear through cracked window a small cry from the wetting woods maybe a hedgehog drowning in its caverns under pinestraw wiring or a chick washed out of its nest by the falling sheets and flying down
tail raised
while she lathers
just feet away from me water breaking on her inside and out
she is only as real as the falling bird outside fluttering weak kicking splashes a place I kissed with a sound like the bird crushed to the ground beneath these blankets I can't believe in her or the water falling As he drove, the overhanging branches tore the bright air into spokes thrown spinning across the road, over the hood, to break through the windshield where they collected in the seat beside him, silent and warm as a body.

The wheels blurred, pulling the car through light and shade, instant by instant. He rolled the dial with his thumb, eliding bands of static, moving through dead stations. The car filled with the sound of water falling from leaves.

The lizard leaped out from the hood, unwrapped in the air by the crush of air, and slapped against the glass, struck by an eighty mile-per-hour palsy.
Its skin shone in the tree-stroked light, pale and wet as a peeled grape, wild tail making faint patter as it slid up the glass. Each foot lost hold in turn.

The trees collapsed behind and the sun fell onto the car, tearing the shadows from its green skin and lifting the lizard up into blazing light.
Nude Words (from a photograph)

She had waded to the waist in words and was crawling into bed when the flashbulb caught the ink on her skin, flaring everything white-- white flesh, white walls, white linen-- only the faint tracery of shadows writhed beneath her to supply definition.
Her vagina squints along the sharp angles of bent legs doused in bad poetry.

It half-rhymes along the backs of calves and a sloppy enjambment pinches the finger thick tendon where thigh ends and hair curls.

Whoever wrote her thought she needed modifying: adverbs set to shatter along ankles and her heels were smeared with stacks of adjectives, each in turn wiped off by a licked thumb and replaced by synonyms.

Her toes are splayed, stretching words into individual syllables.

Her face is lost in shadow behind hair poured like milk over her shoulders.

Though the flash pins her to the mattress and the poem tangles her legs together, unseen eyes draw her to the undifferentiated smooth white where the far wall and the bed join.

Her crawl stamps knee-print haikus along the mattress, shoulder blades threaten through taut skin, and hipbones carve the words like an editor’s pen.

Her movement is the critic; one moment, frozen in this frame, alters the poem as she shrugs off the words and leaves them drying on the sheets, out of context.

The photo is only of the poet’s work.

She is the poem.
Days are packed in lots of thirty high above the counter in the latch locked cabinet beside the fridge’s dusty moon mare in child-proofed orange cylinders.

Pasted dot matrix label suggests once a day as symptoms persist.

Days sit moistening in the hot grotto of a tongue, dry swallow dragging a taste of metal down the throat.

Nights were allergy free while chemical flywheels deep behind cortex spun, slipped gears.
Mg by mg, I am
dissipating,

like

air into standing water, dispersing like a wall collapsing into the sky when the rising sun

caught

on its corners.

I am arming myself against a sea of troubles.

I am drowning in this armor.
The Ghost

Ruffled like a flag of surrender, the white page lifts from a stack of perfectly blank paper and is drawn into the breathing waves that crest through the window’s screen.

In the air, it is put to dance, to intersect dusty beams which reflect from that fair blank, to flash the unattended furniture arranged quietly around the room with seemingly random beacons.

Once the air loses its breath, the page loses its drift and finds a tumble, bowing out into a loop, stopping in a snap, hovering, then floating down to land, corners squared like a fitted sheet, back on the stack it left.
Though the paper is now quiet in place, the stack crisp and flat on all edges, unseen movements still haunt the room.
Lost City: Landscape in Miniature

Somewhere, she snuggles all faultine and fraulein under her blanket of grass and stone.

Trellises trace blue and curve along shoulder and breast down to the soft valley below me.

I walk the silent land of the sleeping city, leaving twilight footprints across her moon-washed flesh.

She stirs and her hair breaks
against the pillow, à bay of sudden wet shadows.

Clambering up the slope of her hip, I find myself high enough to look down on her full sprawl suburban limbs curling from the body like galaxy whorls.

I blow whispers from this height that run in echoes along shimmering flanks tickling the city’s skin to giggle her into shaking awake Spotlights burnish the sky caress its surface and come together as fingers to pluck the moon.
Turning, they sweep the stars aside on their edge like the curves of our hands brushing along the silken smooth of blouses.

These gestures above our homes and heads are unthinking, overwrought pantomimes that pull us to the sides of roads, through doorframes and under sky and lift us by our chins to see mechanical desire in simple movements.
Light peels the clinging atmosphere away like silk to hold the moon
Lake Erie Blues

Painted in gray water light, Erie is an unfiltered aquarium coated in quilts of algae that pad the water, protecting it from the slow drag of shadows as the night rolls the light west.
One could almost step across the skin; it seems no less solid than the shore.

When the day dies for good, a light stabs out, stirring the shadows to swirl around the flashlight’s blade as it cuts a hole in Erie’s flesh and the dark drains in.

Manny lets the light rest still in spots before he moves on to let the radiance diffuse its way deeper.
He looks for whatever he happens to find, and he’s entranced by what flies from his hand.
The land isn’t the land; the lake isn’t the lake.

All that is, is the cone of light jumping in unbounded night.

One end scoops a crescent from the face of a half-remembered boy; the other searches for a reflection.

Something Like Music

Left foot-- toes cramp-- cold on the lip of the toilet, electric toothbrush jackhammering molars, one hand on the green handle the other on my spout guiding the sound of static down to water, trying to catch the echoes of the song

I was just singing with the glass voice of a girl small enough to get lost in my body. Each word is rounded like the chimes of a clock pulling at my chest, pulling me up out of piles of sleep and sheets, and pulling my mouth wide open to release

Clear throat and cough voice into the bowl, bending over, alone above the toilet, looking for something special in the swirl as it falls through the floor

The Butterfly

Jet engines yawn with dry throats, suck the sky in to gain height, pull the ground aflutter, lift each glittering wing up from weeds like knives drawn, and set them to rumbling around the cut diamonds of the chain-link fence.

The butterflies rise, clamber over echoes, lifting free of the flowered life, the warm dirt and those who live in it.
They tumble up over the freeway thuddering with great armored trucks that drag their thoraxes behind.
Flicking themselves free by measures, their wings catch the sun and flash everything with wet reflections.

The watery light diffuses in the air.
Some settle,
some are pulled down the concrete in battering currents, winking out into steely glints as the distance drowns.

One pair of wings wraps the air and swings along like an ape in vines, clawing higher into the thickening day.
Sunlight shines through the abstract black sketching on each bladed wing, casting the faintest shadow on road, fence, and leaf alike, like the indentation of handwriting on the following page.
Flutterbye

Your car is a cigarette snuffing against the underpass, glass blowing to ash to hang in a flutter of colloidal light; metal folds like a passed note stolen away in a fist. And it’s on fire, lighting me where I stand across the street, still raising my eyebrow at our smiles crossed through your window.

There will be smoke soon, and maybe noise will lift from the still colliding tangle of glass, girl and steel, swelling out in a shimmer, lifting great liquid wings into the trees.

The leaves will puncture the iridescent skin, tearing it open until the sound suspends the sky; I drift and separate from the sidewalk as its weight flushes downhill.
This moment will crack

when you kiss the glass but now you are beautiful, hovering.
Scars

When the two-by-four nailed itself through my foot, I was running a spiral in a South Houston junkyard, jumping across the planks stitched along the leaking contusions of sun-boiled trash bags.
The rucksack swinging from my hand sagged with sifted fragments of imagined treasure.

I hugged that sack to my chest, my teeth biting through the zipper as I skied on the concrete.
Marbles, dice, and board game tokens bounced along my legs, and stuck in the blood congealed to glue on the surface of the board.
I slide the mile home with my bare foot burning on the summer surface, flip flop long lost.

Eight giant steps in that three foot clown shoe pulled me over the lawn until I wedged and jammed this uncrossed cross in the screen door; the nail suddenly unzipped itself through bone.
The empty sack did not pillow the floor in the slightest.
Since then, other scars have been written across me: chin, finger, chest, wrist. A knuckle doesn’t fit anymore. Ankles twist like summer taffy.

Each scar loops and jumps in a woman’s handwriting, curled lines left in flesh by the pads of her fingers.

I tell intricate lies to seduce her into writing more.
From the AWP Conference (March, 2002)

The EXIT sign flickers with tantalizing neon porn lights.
Across the floor-- green and exploding with golden leafy swirls, randomized chaos in parallel lines—waft the gentle, modulated tones of poetry.

The room is huge with nothing to sop up the bouncing sounds of this rhythmic, toneless voice armed with “penis” and “vagina;” the scattered listeners, silent in their seats, do little to absorb the poet’s words from bouncing from wall to wall, all along the same damn chaos that runs to each corner. The sign sizzles in the poet’s pauses, popping like needles trapped spinning in the dust of grooved jazz platters.

Beneath the sign, beyond the casino carpet, behind the white door scuffed from rubber soles, basted entrees, and sweat crushed into fingertip swirls is a clatter of flatware tumbling into a sink, and distant singing, “'Ay Yi Yi Yi.'”
The full-throated call buffets its way through the percussion of plastic trays slamming together under the steaming froth of the sink.

The poet shuffles paper and thanks the front row, lost in the darkness beyond the spotlight that holds her in place. Her eyes follow the echoes of her voice to the battered door lit by the EXIT as glass makes music on an unseen floor and someone sings, “Cunt!” in the kitchen.

Polite applause to follow.
She is an alien landscape where he brings his mouth down glistening curves to shadowed valleys crushed with infinitesimal hairs that shift with his breath.

Wind wipes across skin worked into burnished whorls and calligraphy tracings which crinkle in what light filters through the cotton sky draped over us. It is easy to forget why he came to her, pulled under sheets to an atmosphere heated into mist, itself pulled into tight spirals by the subtle shifting of limbs.

It bites the tongue like a 9-volt.

She opens with tectonic speed.
   Pink alluvial silting-- this is where all rivers end and all voyages wash up. A siren croons under the sky, calling him to a perilous berth on strange land.

Whole photo albums of the stranger posing with people I love – the pages snap like blinds under my thumb –

Some enormous dunce whose face is all sweaty cheek eyes like marbles pressed in a ham smiles, page after page, with his arm around my mother, bent with a courtly kiss to my lover’s nose.
They laugh, burrowing comfortable into his bulk.
In each frame, he does the strangest things with his hands and never extends his neck

– he looks up, out, at me.
I keep meeting his eyes, glassy with a momentary happiness, thrilled by the camera’s flash.
The man in the photos isn’t the man who holds them.

Whatever lonely fear keeps shuffling these chemical images is replaced in the bright flare by a lopsided smile.

The beard he pulls with his free hand is a ragged mat of dark with scattered golden threads reflecting, the patch of white under the chin occluded by the weight of the face’s shadow.
Expression

The hope rests in mimicking with words what the doctor did with her hands, each finger tipped with a stretched bubble curving under the vanilla stretch of surgical gloves.

Laid bare from the waist up, hair spread across my chest like press-dried butterfly wings, I sweat imprints through the strip of paper on the table which tore itself to tatters as I squirmed under her grip.

What the doctor set free ripped across my chest, attempting flight, and burrowed itself into the potted, plastic ficus, battering the Venetian blinds to ruffle like wings pulling at air.
Slats of light shuddered around the room, stricken for a moment.

The cyst, snapped open like a clutch purse clasp, scattered slim copper coins which the doctor, sexless with my blood on her gloves, collected to secret away in gauze pads.
The room stinks like the inside of my body.
“You get to play the home game,” she said as a nurse pinned back her hair to start dabbing at the plant. She shucked her gloves and jimmed on a new pair to pat my head. “As long as the hole stays open, you can express yourself.”

I spent nights in a mirror trying to bleed myself as she did, pulling poison out from under my skin onto white rags. A doorknob of scar tissue finally twisted the wound shut without my ever learning the cheat of her fingers.
Echo

In this empty place, sing and let the echoes dance.

Our songs are songs
of exquisite loneliness.

Everything we breathe comes out in a panicked hunt for ears, reverberating across the rafters dusty with clouds.

The roof almighty, we cry to you!

Throw back our sounds for once in a voice not our own.

Sing of arms and a woman, one drawing us from the other.

A chorus of newborns sounds the void, bereft.

their songs are songs
of exquisite loneliness.

That sound of the first shout echoes in our chests we sing it amongst ourselves but never speak; it is the scream of waking up and the threat of sex.
This is all we have to talk about, fully aware that the calls we loose will never fill the pitted scar we share.

Our lives repeat the sound, repeat the despair of cruel release.
Rubbing song against song to recreate the heat of the padded walls that held us, silent save for the whispered drum we kept rhythm with in the water we first saw light move through.
Fill this empty place with noise
and let the echoes dance.
All songs are songs
of exquisite loneliness.
The Levee Cows

She lives on a street where cows step horizontal to the road, each cleaving inverted hearts in the thick hummock bordering the River.
They moan in their chests and turn their faces to the water beneath the earth as it nuzzles at the yielding surface of their world, delicate as a curl of flesh, wet with the rush and push, yeartning to yawn wide and pull each kicking beast under.

At night with her window open, they harmonize with the lowing of the levee cows as the ground beneath them is licked free like beads of sweat and swallowed to New Orleans.
Knees bite into her mattress as he lowers himself to kissing, one hand on her stomach the other reaches for the wall to keep from her from falling out from under him.

Paternity Suit

Tailors have a way of looking at a guy, like cops at car wrecks waiting for the ambulance.
They chalk lines and talk in gruff negatives, pulling and tucking unsure how intact the body is crammed in the wreckage.

When they are caught in mirrors, moving behind a body, they roll away from the reflection like the moon compacting down to the cruel sliver of a smile.
They hunch between legs, tug the fabric from crotch, pat, prod, think of the sort of stick they would use if they could poke.

They are burial artists, experts in fashionable rags, sizing a cotton coffin across the chest, snug in the shoulders, everything else hangs like billowing burial cloth.
The suit is a snare and the tie is the pin that holds back the snap.
Wyrd

Somewhere there’s a man posed before a library shelf of blank headstones waiting to chisel a check from me.

Somewhere there’s a tailor with needles in his teeth and inched tape wrapped around his fingers like brass knuckles.

Somewhere there’s a bullet with my name on it and the knife that carved it there.

A man in an alley and a woman at the end of an aisle, each with thumbs hooked together and tapping toes,

wonder what’s taking me so long.

Tumors crowd together in an unpurchased pack of Marlboros waiting for the light to switch on, and a heart attack is hiding in a sirloin like plastic Baby Jesus crammed up the backside of a Mardi Gras King Cake.

There are children swimming in my testicles-- packed and waiting for moving day-- tapping pencils idly to their chins as they plan out Christmas lists and recriminations.

(Math, 9/11)

Torn up to the sky, white origami wings lift on convection currents, spin above settling dust like tenuous tea leaves that swirl above sunken sediment.

Vital forms in triplicate swarm above Manhattan; the carbon that separates them burns slowly tugged from crushed outboxes and thrown from windows, litters the easterly wind.

Flapping and following, the gravity folds them and they fold their own bodies into a tight formation of paper airplanes that bombard the streets of Brooklyn, falling past the crying pie-eyes of grandfathers who run outside to protect their lawns as the paper blizzards down, striking each home with simple precision.

(Aftermath, 9/12)

Rakes bite down with the orderly teeth of combs to gnaw lawns into straight lines, shuffle paper and leaves into separate stacks.
Everything is filed at sidewalk edges, spindled on the rakes.

When it rains tomorrow, signatures will bleed out into the grass, effortlessly forgotten, leaving a stain.
Return To Cydonia

“He never left his tower the lab, the telescope, just stared up at heaven and waited for a sign.”
-Amy Montz, “Doomsday Astronomer”

She has this idea of poets as astronomers, their eyelashes as great blades scything the sky, plucking beauty from the emptiness.
“What are you thinking about?”

There was once a glowering face on Mars, that too much squinting has shattered to bare rock and drifting sand.
Cydonia is lifeless now, its face stripped away
by infinitesimal razors.
The ground is and statues wasted by the rotors of our eyes.

Mars, once cut with grand canals that scrawled across its face in strange sigils-- bold liquid tattoos-- is now breathless and red-faced hanging low in the sky.

The water dried into the land, lifted into the air, and rusted it all the same.

“You never write about me” The greatest fear I have is that I will look at her too long and wear her away.
Manny’s Final Transmission

Manny Carcano falls from space, suspended between steel walls papered in ink-thumbed poetry.

Everything is tearing to ash from friction.

Incandescent, Manny tumbles into the Earth’s shadow.

His satellite throws its own light as he skims along the membrane of air throwing off sparks
and the sound of static, like wind shuffled pages, drilling whispers into the walls.

He is in a still burning cigarette end thrown from shore into the moving nothingness of the ocean at night, not a thing in itself but the whispering border around everything else.

He stretches into a line of light drawn between the emptiness of the sky and the emptiness of the water.
The light casts sound on the unseen waves moving below.

It will stutter along, broken and chewed
by the uneven teeth
of the unreflective crests, until it reaches any sanctuary shore offered.

“I am not dying.”
Vita

A university instructor, editor and writer during the day, Anthony William Rintala spends his nights delving into popular culture and hoping to discover how poetry can reconnect to the masses. The solution to this problem, once distilled, will be mass marketed in decorative containers, each emblazoned with his name.