

2006

Brackish

Hillary Dalton Major

Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.lsu.edu/gradschool_theses

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Major, Hillary Dalton, "Brackish" (2006). LSU Master's Theses. 3815.
https://digitalcommons.lsu.edu/gradschool_theses/3815

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at LSU Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in LSU Master's Theses by an authorized graduate school editor of LSU Digital Commons. For more information, please contact gradetd@lsu.edu.

BRACKISH

A Thesis

Submitted to the Graduate Faculty of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Fine Arts in

The Department of English by

Hillary Dalton Major
B.A., Hollins University, 2003
May 2006

Table of Contents

~ I ~	1
Pursuit	2
Photograph, Marina	3
Love for Three Cantaloupes	4
Crabbing.....	5
Coles Point Light	6
~ II ~.....	7
Considering Roommates, Early Spring.....	8
Luna	9
Farmed	10
Love Poem	11
Lizards	12
~ III ~	13
Stopping in Warsaw, Va.	14
I Play with the Colander	15
Manicure	16
Locks.....	17
Babysitter	18
~ IV ~	19
Family Business	20
Circuit Court	21
Celebrating Solstice with My Father	22
MESFLY.....	23
Poem on an Idea Stolen from Thomas Mann.....	24
~ V ~	25
My Sister Reads Poema Veinte	26
Poem on Kate's 19th Birthday	27
Happy Birthday.....	28
Venus Tazorac	29
Notes from a Summer Mission	30
~ VI ~	31
Prayer to Thoth (I)	32
University Church.....	33
Eleousa.....	34
Vow of Poverty	35
Psyche	36
~ VII ~.....	37

Dredging Rudee Inlet.....	38
Cormorant	39
Oceanfront Room, March 2000	40
Dream of Losing	41
Phone Call from 900 Miles North.....	42
~ VIII ~	43
Tonight I am awake	44
Pet	45
Diademata	46
A Visit.....	47
Prayer to Thoth (Lambent)	48
~ IX ~	49
Old Friend	50
Dream with Crucifix	52
Ursus Major	53
Dream with White Rabbit	54
And the Tongue is a Fire.....	55
~ X ~	56
The Summer Country.....	57
Branson's Cove, August	58
Pipefish	59
Granddaddy's River Ghazal.....	60
Potomac Ghazal	61
Vita.....	63

~ I ~

Pursuit

After the storm, we flew balloons over the Potomac.
The shore moved with driftwood. I wove between ospreys dragging rafters and dumped my sandbags on the point's neon light. You disappeared in the high water line, leaving a wet trail of books, red leatherbound and soggy paperbacks. A mud toad puffed himself on Johnson's Lives and along the shore old wells filled like mirrors.
Behind me I could see our bright silk shadow in the sky.

Photograph, Marina

in the trunk of a car pulled up to the edge of the grey pier sits an Igloo pulled open revealing its proud mountain of ice the cubes glistening and beginning to melt around the edges the brown and green necks pushing up silver caps throwing sparkles onto the lid of the trunk sits a handed down carseat sits a baby buckled who sees wide strip of blue the white spines of masts with their sails furled and the great red-cheeked faces leaning close then gone

Love for Three Cantaloupes

The summer we grew them in the backyard, tilled, furrowed, dumped out the 99¢ Safeway seed packet, spent June mornings pulling inkberry trees.
And they all came ripe at once, dolls' head humps on the vine that spread over the lot behind the forsythia bush like a blacksnake across asphalt, its last meal swelling its sides, shiny surges of slick skin.
My mother cleaned them in the sink, split and scooped, pulled mud and strung guts from the kitchen drain.

My grandfather at breakfast, bourbon and water and the Rappahannock Record by his bowl, shakes out the front page and sends me his stern sidelong glare.
Spoon, salt and pepper— he says—like a true Tidewater Virginian, scooping up soft divits while juice wells in scalloped puddles like tide pools, rain caught in an upturned oyster shell.

But on the front porch we swing our legs and cut slices like trophies, great weeping wedges;
we slide knives along the curve of rind, proud to touch the pad of thumbs without cutting through.
We sketch a clinical crosshatch, quarter soft fruit flesh, and spear each bite, delicate, let it drip a moment suspended, before tongues touch summer sweetness and the soft pointprick of steel.

Crabbing

On good days, the sorting took hours and the crabs began to dry in their baskets, spitting in the effort to wet gills a white froth that heaved through the slats of the bushel.

I learned to wield the tongs, separate clinging couples, crack the claws of hardshells so they wouldn't fight.

I learned to inspect backfin joints for cerulean bled to rosy pink and tell a peeler by the darkening segments of her slick, white belly.

I tossed leathery papershells off the pier into brown water.

They sank like leaves floating from poplars, kicking sideways and spiraling down.

Some afternoons I stood above the shedding tank and watched the struggle play out like a soap opera or war documentary.

The shell splits and the meat of the back pushes out, quivering, barely solid.

There is no return:

the body a death to pull slowly away from.

Dimpled green carapace slides from its shell with the speed of growing grass, barely visible, effort without sound, total captivation.

At the last stages, two crabs twist before me, the delicate unfolding of soft claws, limbs loosened from the trapping husk.

I carry a pulsing new thing like an organ on my palm, run bare-legged up the hill to the refrigerators.

Coles Point Light

Come morning, all I see is fishing boats, lines cast among the rocks for plate-sized flounder, croakers, spot.
On a clear day the new sun paints white hulls red, sizzles away fog on the Maryland shore, strikes bare joints of the steel frame hulking like some great aquatic spider.

My father, showing off, threads between stone and screwpile, the Evinrude spitting like a cat, crests slapping hollow against aluminum sides, a sound like a rainy Sunday in the tin-roofed Methodist church.
I lean against the thwart to watch shadow bar my father's face and spread jungle gym reflections on the waves.

He remembers, he says—laundry flapping in a fall wind, the constant whitewashing, muslin curtains drawn at dormer windows.
Now cormorants perch on stripped scaffold; a herring gull circles the reflecting panel, lazy, a fish head in its beak.

At night, mosquitos drift through rents in the screening.
I swing on the front porch glider, stare into gridiron darkness.
Off the point, a light blinks small and sure where it floats on the edge of sight.

~ II ~

Considering Roommates, Early Spring

cold spell and the spider that shared my shower preserved till now by cowardice and my vain desire for peace on earth has succumbed leaving its sticky cone in the windowsill unremarkable, netting no fly as if its black poet lived on moisture the margin between web and weather, only sill's flaking paint these splinters, soft entrances for beasts that sidle and crawl, baby roaches, ants lizards

at night press up against the sun-warmed bricks tiny fingers thrust into pockets of mortar finical skins turn faintly rose, their lumpy forms throbbing impatient for planter's moon, peach blossoms carrying the season against their spines their regimental heartbeat crumbles stone, conquers my silence

Luna

Linnaeus must have thought the moon this color, but I have never seen the sky so green and bright.
Sometimes I think it the color of a nearly-ripe lime or the neon highlights of the Corona parrot in the bar down the street.
I am never persuaded.

That spring I was eight and married to the blonde boy who already knew algebra.
Every day the blacktop was a different locale, a stop on our honeymoon safari, the kids playing dodgeball great apes, on Tuesday giant pandas.
We were still surprised to walk into a world of wings.

He would have shown me the nearly imperceptible feathers and thick brown antennae, explained the cycles of death and metamorphosis.
But I would not touch or look too closely where they had fallen thick over the asphalt and sidewalks, though it burned: two green wings caught in the chain-link fence.

Farmed

mantis belly beats my window crossbar glowing shakes mica off my blinds
I started with one you with black lips at my window say they eat wings & plastic bags I kept in my pocket said thank you my carapace eleison growing claw hooks and aphids (in large numbers) all young insects in your green glass box

Love Poem

At night, ladybugs find the ceiling lamp, chime against the opaque glass with elliptical, buzzing insistency, writing rhythms like a gamelan choir, a rock fall sliding down a long, shale slope.

A kid, I thought they all must be like rubies.
Now I know the gamut some brown, some yellow faded copper, the exact color of her hair—she always had something to prove about being a redhead.

After too many nights or minutes, she burns, with a scent of musty leaves, scorches those soft and jointed segments underneath.
Ochre shells empty on my bedspread as if our insides could sublimate, instant, leave nothing to shelter.

Lizards

In September after two days of clouds, the lizards start to slow.

I find tails on my path still spinning lonesome neon blue pinwheels.

Yesterday under the peach tree, a chameleon spilled intestines from its side, loop on snow white loop.

The landlord's cat sleeps on my doorstep.
I write only of summer.

~ III ~

Stopping in Warsaw, Va.

for a half gallon butter pecan & bloodworms, I raise my head from the sun-warmed plush of the back seat. The mutt knocks her paws against the rolled-up window, watching my father's back retreat across the dusty parking lot.
A man sells cantaloupe and Silver Queen by the bushel from the back of a truck.
I can see his broad teeth beneath the rusty bristles of his lip.
The mutt makes two, sharp sounds.
I slouch and watch the impress of my toes on the soft ceiling.
Slow maroon bubbles move and refill empty egg spaces.
Outside, the last noisy crop duster lowers to its landing. Red sun washes and leaves behind the fields.

I Play with the Colander

dark kitchen cabinets and the knees of a woman those cords of blue, those bony ankles, my mother's mother's the narrow aisle between sink and countertop island unlike her, such awkward geography this must be the house on Diane and the straight line of a hem on the upward edge of sight what arms and faces are missing, what voices olive drab, the colander makes a good hat each hole punched through into a four-pointed star no one considered these small sharpnesses dangerous the rim of the colander touches my chin but I can see this foolish hybrid child is this even me, or a cousin, a sister the world is a thousand dancing spangles the small, spinning lights of memory

Manicure

My great-uncle had perfect fingernails, long eggshell ovals, fingernails that really tapered.
Untouched by yellow when he was young, filed to smoothness: even when he began to forget his glasses, his bathrobe, my father's name... a lifetime of care left them strong.
My mother never noticed, transfixed by his milky eyes, sour breath, straggling beard that filled with phlegm.
But my eyes,
on our rare visits, could not escape the bedrail closed under his folded fingers, each tipped white like candy corn.
His hands were always so still.
My mother never saw, but she would have loved them, loved them for their graceful curves and refusal to snag or shatter.
She would have painted them in her million pinks and reds that she keeps in such neat rows, arranged in groups, from Blush to Blazing Cherries.
She would have stroked them with her tiny brushes and all the coats would lie thick and smooth, not splotched and lumpy like the time she held my hand, too fat to be graceful, and tried to turn me Pretty in Pink.
She saw me biting down the lacquered layers spitting blood and sharp edges.
Now she talks of bad habits. As I strip up the cuticle with my teeth, gnawing patiently against the quick, I think of my great-uncle, alone with his file.

Locks

1

For three years my hair has hung straight despite my mother's gifts—hot curlers, a sheaf of Quik Cuts coupons from the Sunday paper.
Take Pride in my Appearance she says.
Declare War on Split Ends.
She stockpiles hair sprays, volumizers, and mousse.
She has not given up on grandchildren.

2

Nights cold and faintly sour, lips vulcanized tasting smoke and Guinness on a stranger's tongue.
I run fingers behind his ears, twist them through strands that glow in the amber stage lights, turn to brass in the morning street.

3

My mother cut hers at 30.
At 40 my father let his grow missing the barber's appointment month after month.
It took a funeral to win his grudging submission, but dusting the bookshelf one December I uncovered it in a cedar box, the six inch length still clasped by a rubber band, curled in its small compartment, a child sleeping and forgotten.

Babysitter

The first time he kept us after my grandmother died, he watched PBS downstairs, Brünnhilde singing on a blue stage.
In the kitchen
I made Waldorf salad.
It was white, so I knew to use lots of milk, laughing, unreeling paper towels to mop up what spilled over the sides of the crystal punch bowl.
It seemed hours later, my sister asleep on the floor with a soggy apple, I stamped our return address on the linoleum with inkpads I found in the drawer of the dry sink.
I never remembered after what he said, his face turned slow shades of tomato, only how he stood at the head of the stairs, silver hair glinting like the ring he still wore, rough hands loose at his sides, silent for a long time.

~ IV ~

Family Business

There is something about sneezing blood into a Kleenex that reminds me of how Grandpa gave all my father's comic books to the Children's Sanatorium while he was away at VPI. That was the Christmas he never came home, and no one knew he had gone to Jersey with his wrestling roommates.
Grandpa says, he'll never learn.
My father studies the displays in collectibles shops and sighs.

Grandpa worked in the Sanitary, two blocks down from Marshall High School, waxing floors and swabbing cabbage.
He wasn't paid overtime, but every day after closing he sliced himself a fresh bologna sandwich.

Grandpa tells me this in the post office.
What he made an hour wouldn't buy a stamp.
In those days, we knew the meaning of hard work.
Once he came to see me after school;
I was stocking lawn fertilizer.
For weeks he told everyone he met about seeing me up on that ladder, but I don't think he really approved.

Coming home after midnight, I leave my employee badge on the mantle, move the pile of classifieds from my father's chair and watch paid programming.
I know from the neat way the gravel is raked in the driveway that Grandpa has been by.
Last week, while my father watched and muttered low deprecations, he sharpened our lawnmower blades in the height of the afternoon sun.
A man's got to do something, if he isn't dead.

Circuit Court

Deeds in the dark. Mellow clerks in sunglasses bury you in olive cabinets and heavy three-rings. Feathery red ants claim the peaks of working lunch. Crumbs flattened for posterity. Gossip blankets mimeographs and manila.
Divorcée with million dollar home and DUI conviction.
Love notes slipped in with court costs, remittance notice.
Expense account dates in the county caf. Salad bar with history of tort, rubbery bacon bits. Salisbury with side of civil code. Lawyers tap glass, fight dull lampshades for the spectacled eyes of round-shouldered women. Jan squints, smiles into fluorescent hallway. Fist on desk, Frank stapling the land-disturbance permit.

Celebrating Solstice with My Father

these slow paths the heart of city park each footstep prayer I must not place too quick must feel the age of the tired day, the present winter those who walk behind me not for the first time ribbon of worshippers who wind this skein again inured to the eyes of joggers, come not for sport move solemn our separate silences into those coils fed one by one to the mouth of the maze the cold is not enough to see our breathing a cloud of smoke rises from a fire a candle in my hands, a winter tree and all the black birds singing in its branches the sun goes down; the people walk their dogs I watch the others from the fold-out table where my father watches, the Coleman lantern torches, tea lights, all his jurisdiction the Dixie cups in which the candles shine the waxed bags weighted with damp gravel luminary, each fifteen cents at Whitman's Bakery and enough butane to last through equinox

MESFLY

Every morning, head bent over the Jumble (silver comb-over swirl, faintly yellow from some old-fashioned product) hunched in the plastic arms of a mall food court's stackable chair, he solves the day's mystery and watches the young mothers with their children.

He would tell you, if you asked, of years spent in other places, dancing at Tantilla Gardens with Coot and Junie Hove, 40 years safe driving for AT&T.
He'd tell you of Dot, whom he taught to drive, a manager in the shoe dept. when they met and pretty enough to model dresses.

He'd show you a pocket of change.
(He walks the drive-thrus before they open.) A penny saved is a penny earned.
It amazes him, the things people throw away but even more what they come up with.
A homily for every occasion, he keeps a dictionary for the toughest cases sure there's no word he can't unscramble.

Poem on an Idea Stolen from Thomas Mann

The terraced courthouse steps are grey, limestone devolved to shades of wet concrete, the almost purple of the stratus that has pressed for six days on the finials and crowns of these stolid buildings, streets of pulped newspaper, graveyards quiescent in their cages of cast iron. On the portico, a stranger in a yellow raincoat, his black umbrella folded, spike-tipped, gripped around the middle like a sceptre.
I long for airports, for the black grime of bus and train stations, tracks vanishing south into light that is heavier than water.

~ V ~

for my sister

My Sister Reads Poema Veinte

in the lap of the Lazy Boy, her knee drawn to her chest, book propped below her eyebrows and the half moon of her forehead.
Words are fluid and thick like the undercurrents of black water, as forceful and inconsiderate of meaning.
At full stops, she lowers the book, meets my eyes with wide brown ones, dropping yo la quise and ella me quiso over the precipice of pages.
Her lips are dark and shine with spit and the book presses against her tanktop, under which she wears no bra.
For me, she translates with a rough speed that admits no poetry and accepts no questions, brief stumblings resolved into firmness that strips sentences to a diary of truths.
She claims the living forms of love, closes the book with a smile that defers to no one.

Poem on Kate's 19th Birthday

It was good of me to call she says her voice stretched a kite string pulling against the knot the plastic spool.
She's on the road.
The spaces around her words crackle her news— she's been visiting Jimmy the guy in the photo— losing to the radio's stubborn electric guitar losing to static losing to the hum of tires the constant battery of wind.

Happy Birthday

In the front room, the twins cut the cake and we've eaten it, or mostly, and Troy says what's left is like a fudge-covered pith helmet.
Deb says more like something a bear left in the woods.
She moves the giant pine cones around on the table.
Nate readjusts the scented pillars by height and says maybe he should have used baking powder or soda anyway, and we all say it's just fine.

So Yuki says what we need is a little happiness and she turns on the lights, those Christmas whites that wind up the stair rail, and I pour myself another drink from the magnum, pinot grigio, which is sophisticated and cost efficient, and Deb arranges the candles so the whites face off against the pinks across the dark lumpy remains and Nate says probably it was the oven.

And now Deb is flipping through cards, but no one's up for a betting game, and Nate throws the dice from the Monopoly set again and again.
Troy and Yuki are in back playing 100 Keyboard Classics. Troy's taking bass and Yuki's running a long string of triplets down the treble in something that might have once been Beethoven but isn't anymore and the candles flicker and the wine in my glass glows and throws back the light from the Christmas stair rail and the smelly candles and sloshes and even the floorboards rock a little and Troy stamps the peddle and their four hands race toward each other and for a moment everything comes together.

Venus Tazorac

In the morning, she rubs her face with tazarotene and by evening it peels away, bright mica sheeting.
She worries, a little, but smiles.
There is always more.
Someone has told her, and she believes, in ultimate density.
I tell her, you are not woman, more than everlasting.
Hold your skin tight and sail with it.

Notes from a Summer Mission

Kate writes from Juarez.
Dust makes the sky more blue though less approachable.

She crosses left to right, bareheaded and sinful in the cathedral.

Only granite in Barrio Lavalle is grey baptismal font.

Flies settle on the knifeblade-ribbed adobe dogs who find no shadow.

Kate buys bright blankets.
Yellow toothed concertinist breathes soft corridos.

El Paso snow cones: Kate chooses blackberry topped with chili powder.

~ VI ~

Prayer to Thoth (I)

Moon-god, scribe, our alphabet is the second-hand of life.
Ibis-god, invisible in the deep places when I call, Fly free, give me the vantage of your long-limbed height.
Teach me to fish elegantly not to regret the things I pierce and swallow.

University Church

No services today, it seems.
It's spring break after all.
The reverend's at home hiding eggs for his children and the light's on outside the church office (matthew five sixteen) but it's like they say—on the sidewalk in front of the holly bush, a waxwing, breast egg yellow flies rising up from its eyes.

Eleousa

The Theotokos looks out from my wall at piles of unsorted laundry, congealed pizza, and the line of half-crushed cans contorting along a shelf's edge, hiding the spines of books.
She says nothing, but her eyes sink through the room, bore past the drawn curtains into deepening darkness.

– I have walked halls where dark-haired men bend under a gallery of eyes.
I have felt the sighs of a hundred foreign martyrs and watched George wrestle multiform worms, black, green, red,
some with wings,
one with the jowls of a wolf.
In a room no living woman will ever see, above me, someone dipped his brush into egg whites salted with gold, traced my garments and the curve of my skull.

The eyes I meet hold more space than these cinder block walls, the TV, the corner of disheveled mattress I allow into her view.
Somewhere in Russia she gazes with the same impassivity, leaf flaked from her nimbus to bare dark patches above the cheek she presses to her infant's curls.
I am held by black pupils in a contest I cannot win, knowing there will be no rebuke, no softening at the corners of her set mouth.

Vow of Poverty

these things you left me:

your kneepads stained with the red mud of Bath County where we camped and crawled through darkness and slept under stone three cardboard picture frames patterned with sunflowers candles not the long yellow kind you'll learn to make fat pink pillars scented with cinnamon and hibiscus

T-shirts too bright for traveling or novitiate the fringed blue shirt I always admired with its wooden beads and batik zebras your calendar marked with feasts and fasts

you must have sold the viola on which you taught me a scratchy scale where you go there are no sisters only mothers and you a spelunker in the stone home of women and God you leave me in a parking lot, your possessions in the department store bag at my feet the stores are closing and the electric lights come on all at once

Psyche

after Susan Seddon Boulet

The angle of your shoulder, bare, cast of your eyes and smooth, tilted forehead, like the wing of a shearwater over the archipelago, reflect summer's end blue.
In your hands, the pale arc of egg you stole from a seaside nest or found, tossed and orphaned by the wind.
You clutch it like your bridal posy.
Do you peer beyond the frail shell to something deeper, pulsing?
Do you sense the faint pressure of your fingertip, the shatters already beginning to spread, nearly invisible, radiating, making dark paths in the whiteness, a tapestry waiting to be revealed?
Can you imagine the journey to hell?
Here, the blue of morning seals your face like marble, perpetual maiden on the promontory.
Eyes sear the distance: the flash of his wings, the heat of hatching.

~ VII ~

Dredging Rudee Inlet

Land never ends at night, or sea, stars are only passing ships no farther than the blinking red green channel marks or running lights hung on the cutter's whitewashed stays, thin lines vanishing in air deny the hidden bulk of hull.
Sun shows the spewing black tide pouring from shore to sea, dark with ulterior fluid, the pipe's mouth crowded with dirty gulls, squabbles over glaze-eyed fish, the rare blue ovule of an unopened mussel.

Cormorant

At first, I thought it driftwood, a branch bored through by sand, smoothed and thinned in surf, a found poem,
a work of modern art.
Now I see the lattice is bone. Ribs curve around a shred of green weed.
That dark burl its head, still feathered,
beak polished abalone, and tide moving in to bury or expose.

Oceanfront Room, March 2000

On the fifteenth floor, painted railings blacken into night. On the other side of the glass my mother pours cabernet into glasses she never travels without, deals a hand of gin rummy and waits, reading the menu from the Mariner Lounge.
There is no moon, only a dull shimmer from the nightspots down the strand, below, a pencil sketch floodwall and pale, skirling ribbons dancing up.
A northeaster keens and stirs the breakers, loosening spume: something white speeds past my face on a salt wind, tight like a knob of surfworn concrete, but soft, a clot of meringue.
It strikes against the window door—the sudden arrest of a wood pigeon that lasted a week in my shoe box—but slides, one more streak on the cloudy glass, to the crusted outdoor rug as I watch, evaporates even to the last quartz grain glimmer.
Inside, bulbs yellow stained comforters and the worn backs of cards.

Dream of Losing

I woke with the years of another life, a hazel-eyed lover,
a room with square windows.
I fought in a doomed and noble revolution, learned the rabbit's sense for bunkers and caves.
I ran through seasons and buried brown boxes sealed with wax.
Today at my desk
I forget all faces, the words of my clandestine letters, counsels whispered and received.
I only see a cliff of yellow sandstone, a bright green verge of trees, how a hat brown and rumpled floats a moment on the soundless wind and falls.

Phone Call from 900 Miles North

It's snowing here, heavy clots that dimple on the wooden dock and melt. The old wood turns spotted, then darker than the sky.

It's just cold enough for snow but the wind is icy.

It dives down each trough and kicks up white spume as the waves crest and break onto heaps of oyster shells smashing them to dust.

The snowflakes dissolve without even touching water.
Wish you were here.

~ VIII ~

for Sarah

Tonight I am awake

though you snore softly, two green and brown lumps under my grandmother's afghan.
This evening, arranging squashed, square pillows on the couch so your head turns now toward my open door, you do not say, Since she left I cannot sleep alone, I walk past lighted windows and record the hour of moonset, drink bad coffee in the allnight diner, and wait for the five a.m. rush of traffic and birdsong.

Pet

You said the squirrels—their brown bodies bunched among clover or sunk in the obscene cauldrons of cypress knees—remind you of rats, that you want to lift the furred fat of their necks between thumb and finger and stare into the igneous sheen of their eyes, to watch those quaint five-fingered feet give up swimming.

In the wet air under evergreens, you shift your hold, drop that bushed tail against your elbow, bring those buckteeth to your breast.

Diademata

Today I read a Southern novel about siblings who are separated at birth and fall in love dooming three generations to incest and miscegenation in Mississippi and I wonder about you and the nights you spent on my couch that was really an army cot and how you and she and I found ourselves in the suicide ward eating sushi. And I brought you lilacs tied with a blue ribbon that I had to take back in my pocket and give to the nurse with my shoelaces and chopsticks. The wasabi burned my fingers green like the cones on the magnolias knocking at the grate on the game room window while we sat at the out of tune piano and sang.

A Visit

i

I wondered at directions you did not write did not say follow me from tarmac to stone through red earth follow me until hills turn blue

I came along the weathered wood of your fences your dogs sniffed my fingers at the gate Gelert with his tail like a bone-carved scythe how you have gardened your wasteland of walls these tulips by a local artist framed in town where shops line the brick-paved pedestrian zone it's a twenty minute drive but we will go for a taste of India and to see the statue of George Washington with his three-cornered hat and surveyor's sextant later we watch war films in your dining room with your porch light off not even distance is visible past the French casement

ii

in your room a wooden shutter bars the window presides over your strangely navy sheets you take the couch the greyhound covers my feet ribs digging in the round hill of my ankle redbud hills curling through my sleep like lilacs how they turn inward browning after a few picked hours a transient warbler beats his song through the shuttered slats August dreams in your bed

iii

in the morning you serve omelet you have forgotten
I only eat the white

Prayer to Thoth (Lambent)

and so you sheep-creeped through my nights, quiet, unairconditioned the summer waves sighed as if never rapacious and the moon-opening flowers thanked you for the easiness of slipping into your cold and exemplary eyes my curtains brightened the black sand and salt sheathed the long, quiet grass minnows danced their pavanne through the shallows everything you polished, and my snoring cracked against it with the stern, irreparable blows of a feather

~ IX ~

Old Friend

“And what would you say if your friend disappeared and his head came into the market in miniature?” ~Kon-Tiki

Late August and watching the wind in the peach trees lace together slender limbs with their soft green spear points, you can't help but think of whipping, the springiness of a switch still live with sap.
And reaching to touch the just ripened fuzz of a globe on a lower branch, the pads of your fingers press leather, strangely dry, as if all flesh had rotted away leaving unmistakable his face, though no raisin was ever so bitter and you know that nature breaks away, the metamorphosis of mold, the crusted scars of wounds left by birds, this preservation is nothing so clean as rot.
And he looks at you, you know the slope of his cheekbones, he squints and his eyes are moving, two black ants, and the wrinkles of skin are twisting, fierce, the head spinning on its limb, the dry lips working but can't force sound past blackened gut, the sloppy crosses of stitches for they scrape out the skull and pour in burning sand and you watch the jumping, writhing head and imagine his last words of anger or love or despair and press your thumb across the tough ridge of his mouth, he's still, and later you'll say he was quite unchanged except that he had become so very small.

Dream with Crucifix

The man and the woman are throwing bowling balls down the long red-carpeted aisle in the church.
The people in the pews don't seem to notice.
They sit with programs folded in their laps.
Only one man in the balcony squints and turns through the pages.

The woman holds a ball like a dark plum.
The man's is a leathery orange peel.
The balls never reach the end of the aisle (those glass doors) or leave the bowlers' hands.

The woman's ankles are looped by the gold-plated rims of offering baskets.
The man grows out of a floral arrangement.
His toes are sunk in green decorator moss.

When he steps from the altar, gladioli break like felled cedars.
When her soft sole moves from its circle, the choir begins its psalm.

Ursus Major

At night, the bear gnawed at my shutters, ran long claws down the doorframe, battered the screen with a persistence I slept through like thunderstorms.
The deadbolt was hail, rattling, the way weather can beat a channel into dirt long past dreaming of streams or silver mines.
He took over the den, first, fortified himself in the armchair, wedged the footrest into permanent tilt.
I suspected him of smoking while I was at work but had to admit the odour of charcoal and tobacco had clung to his fur from the beginning.
Now I can hear him at the head of the stairs, wrapped in his terrycloth robe.
Soon he will break a trail down the dark hallway, come for me with blood and honey in his teeth.

Dream with White Rabbit

In the basement of Hotel Skyscraper, the train pulls out from the elevator shaft and runs its half loop over the track in the lobby again.

The little blue engine's steamstack reaches the bellhop's knees.

The guests queue behind the bellhop to watch the train's slow journey, its thrumming mechanical rainbow swallowed by the second elevator.

No one follows the thin black rails or stares back at the elevators' empty grin.

A man peers at a gold watch.

A woman rustles a palmetto fan.

With a billow of blue smoke, the engine spills into the room.

If a woman stepped up to the glowing tracks, she might see into those colorful boxes.

She might reach into the cherry red coalcar and pull free the warm life she finds there.

She might clutch it in her arms and bound for the stairs.

And the Tongue is a Fire

My dream ribboned like kelp through the halls of another woman's house and caught in the kitchen, spun through the bars of chair legs, held by the wicker caning that closed its grate between the dream and the glowing oven's caress, though the light from the oven sparkled through the gaps in the withies like a constellation with Mars ascendant, so that when the gate fell away in the sudden white incandescence, the dream fled, seared and blinded, trying to piece itself together with the faint wisps of smoke and the puzzling smell of fish fry.

~ X ~

The Summer Country

this is the dream where the jewel swims up from the sea many-limbed and climbs the sandy hillside into my fingers this is cancer, the house of my childhood feeding its layer by blue-green layer into my chest gorging its bits of bright white meat onto the black and grey Waterman's Guide pulled apart– the tiny hooks, miniature hammers, dissecting needles paraphernalia of the front porch, the sweet bottom feeder smell smearred over playing cards and bottle caps (all the time it was growing) later, I could see it, the June we sanded the porch furniture uncovered red and white, hunter memories under years of turquoise green (I gave up seafood)

on the yellow beach, their shells, empty, blushing were not unlike those others (scent of Old Bay) before boiling, you must strike with an ice pick to keep the water from building inside I treasured the ones I found, wrapped in tissue their hulls pure art without chelae or fins dry memories of life's gelatin even then I knew how we eat each other

I saved what I could, the remnants, sheds from the hill I looked down at the flat blue sea under its lid, where we are growing

Branson's Cove, August

Sharp-edged grasses curl from the sun, dying in dry patches that crackle with the salty wind.
Weeks will pass before rain turns the hill to a blaze of russet washes the smell of baking fish and soaks black the wooden planks of piers, weathered now to a brown that is almost gray.
The river is clear like beer bottle glass clouded in spots by zipper jellyfish, hugging their extravagant moistness in the shallows drifting toward the blinding shoreline sand.

Pipefish

When the blacksnake came to live in the sunned stack of shells and tunnel his secret way through their iridescent bivalve husks, I got the spade and let it fall like a piling driver, snapping the humpbacked oysters, silting his salty burrows with chalk and rusty iron.

I drove that blade through his flat, seamless scales, speared the sleek, fat roll of him.

Everything essential leaked out and dried on the oysters and mussels like seaweed.

One morning I found his bony fish cousin driven up in the brack, curled and thinner than a winch cable, still wet with the slime of sealife.
I scooped it in my palm, its eye like a drop of black roe above the bugle snout, the limp triangle taper of tail.

Into the quiet brown shallows I waded and held that fish under, waiting for its cord of a body to whip and straighten, for it to float free and nose its needle self into dark water.

I let it drift safe, just behind the breakers.

And when the river returned it, twice, I spread its narrow length out over the sand, where it emptied and dried, lovely little snake.

Granddaddy's River Ghazal

It's a lot of work, keeping a place on the river Oysters and mussels, battered open by the river

I poured this concrete, built this whole damn porch Five miles out, tugboats toil up the river

Wouldn't have nothing without this porch Surf spits bones, sucks bricks into the river

Built the shower, too. Hung that aluminum The blue crab squats in mud, gives its back to the river

I run the flag up every morning, take it down when it rains Toothy bluefish kiss croaker under the heavy river

This place is a lotta work, a lotta work Nettles stretch their arms and drift down the river

Potomac Ghazal

After weeks of rain, red blossoms in the river Glass-eyed croaker in the sand, choked by the river

Broken glass on the porch, ants in pools of wine Your voice louder than the wind lashing the river

One ruby throat swoops to drink from the gallon jar Tea steeped sienna, deeper brown than the river

Once upon a time in the black-and-white Ice made a bridge, we walked across the river

Spring tide, the moon pulls her skirts so far back The mouths of drowned wells gape along the river

Snap beans fall in an enamel bowl
The lighthouse blinks in time, across the river

Slipping through wave crests, three black humps Dolphins, returning after years to this river

The night fog settles like a captain's bad dream Not even stars see what I see in the river

Vita

Hillary Dalton Major is a native of Mechanicsville, Virginia, and has spent much time in that state's Northern Neck region. She received her Bachelor of Arts from Hollins University and her Master of Fine Arts from Louisiana State University. She has served as managing editor (2003-2004) and poetry editor (2004-2006) of the literary journal New Delta Review. Her poems have appeared in the Potomac Review and in the Norton Critical Edition of The Epic of Gilgamesh.