ABSTRACT

Washington’s elite society was a political society where members of Congress, the president, members of his cabinet, Supreme Court justices, and members of the diplomatic corps met with members of the press, and other visitors to the capital, and long term residents came together to form a unique society. This study evolved from the premise that James Sterling Young’s view of Washington City was flawed. Three questions guided this project: How did Washington change over time? Why were specific boardinghouses chosen? and What role did elite wives play in the Washington community?

Washington’s elite community was by definition a political community. For the senators and members of Congress who swarmed to the city during congressional sessions, boardinghouses and hotels provided both accommodation and the opportunity to develop close friendships with other like-minded individuals. Within the various congressional residences conversations often focused on politics. Wives and other non-congressional guests relayed political dinner, and leisure time gossip to their friends and relatives in their home states. On the whole life in boardinghouses and hotels much like fraternal organizations provided members the opportunity to cull important friendships.

Coming to Washington meant that the President’s wife, Congressional wives, and wives of cabinet members became hostesses for political events. Parties, teas, and public assemblies were as much political gatherings as were sessions of Congress. For Washington's elite women, theirs was an environment of power and privilege, and although their society followed proscribed rules, these women had access to most federal officials. As suggested through the actions of these wives, elite women in Washington used their social positions for political means. From 1800-1830 an unwritten etiquette increasingly regulated social behavior in the capital city. Making calls, attending balls, taking tea and even visiting Congress brought these women into the public sphere, open to public scrutiny.
INTRODUCTION

In 1966 James Sterling Young published The Washington Community 1800-1828. The book defined how subsequent historians would view the political and social life of early Washington, D. C.. It created an image of early Washington in which selfless public servants lived in monk-like quarters during their tenure in the swampy federal city. In this dismal city, the branches of government remained physically and socially separate and political parties had little meaning or influence. Young’s stagnant description of Washington and his casual dismissal of the importance of the first party system in the new national capital inspired this project.

As Young says of the constitution and L’Enfant’s plan of Washington, "Both plans prescribe frameworks for action, place the actors, set the stage for the drama of power." This political drama revolved around a unique society—Washington City. CHAPTER 1, "VISIONS OF WASHINGTON IN THE PAST, 1800-1830" provides a brief overview of the city’s growth and physical development, and argues that Washington was a more vibrant, dynamic and changing place than described. This chapter also introduces some of

2 Two recent books which discuss the establishment of the capital at Washington are: Kenneth Bowling, The Creation of Washington, D. C.: The Idea and Location of the American Capital (Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1991), Washington's prominent social figures, and describes some of the diversions available to congressmen and others.

CHAPTER 2, "MESSING AROUND WASHINGTON: CONGRESS, LODGING AND SOCIAL INTERCOURSE," takes a closer look at members of Congress and the role of boardinghouses and hotels in the political community. If the Washington community was, as Young claimed, "a pleasureless outpost in the wilds and wastes" and if "the pursuit of power was socially disparaged as a vocation," why did members return to office year after year? The Biographical Directory of Congress reveals that several members of Congress moved from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and then on to either cabinet positions, diplomatic posts, the Supreme Court, or the Presidency. James A. Bayard (F,DE), Louis McLane (F,DE), Henry Clay (R,KY), James Buchanan (R,PA), and William H. Crawford (R,GA) are but a few who either moved from chamber to chamber, or from Congress to another federal office. Others, such as John Quincy Adams and Benjamin Crowninshield, came to Congress following other federal service.\(^3\) Despite the availability of congressional directories when he wrote The Washington and Bob Arnebeck, Through a Fiery Trial: Building Washington 1790-1800 (Lanham, MD: Madison Books, 1991). Constance McLaughlin Green's, Washington: Village and Capital, 1800-1878 (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1962) remains a standard but dated reference tool for information on Washington.

Community, Young used only the six directories available at the New York Public Library to draw his statistical picture of boardinghouse society. In 1973 Young and Perry M. Goldman published congressional directories for the whole period 1789-1840 and suggested that much could be learned from an examination of them. Young's work has been criticized for other weaknesses besides limited sources. Allan Bogue and Mark Marlaire, for example, found much of Young's documentation "peculiar or strained." They analyzed 53 congressional roll call votes between 1821 and 1842 and they found that political party affiliation was equal to or greater than boardinghouse associations in determining how Representatives voted. Such findings are inconsistent with Young's. Similarly, Noble Cunningham, in The Jeffersonian Republicans: The Formation of Party Organizations, 1789-1801, suggests that state parties were outgrowths of national organizations which had grown up in Congress. ... In a society where distance and difficulties of travel restricted the number of ladies who accompanied their husbands to the Capital, it had become practical for those members of Congress whose political sentiments were congenial to find rooms in the same house or to dine regularly together.\(^7\)

Cunningham like Bogue and Marlaire, recognized members of Congress sought accommodations with politically like-minded compatriots.

Distance and expense prevented many wives and families from accompanying their husbands and fathers to the new capital. However, those families which did make the journey played important roles in the Washington political community. CHAPTER 3, "'PETTICOAT POLITICIANS': ELITE WOMEN, AND THE ETIQUETTE OF A POLITICAL SOCIETY" examines the role women played in elite Washington society. When candidates became office holders, they also became public figures. So did their wives. How did these women spend their days and with whom did they socialize? When the President's wife and the wives of cabinet members come to Washington, they became hostesses for political events. Congressional wives and other more transient visitors left many of their domestic responsibilities at home—as well as many of their young children. From 1800-1830 social behavior in the capital city increasingly was regulated by an unwritten etiquette. Making calls, attending balls, taking tea and even visiting Congress brought these women into the public sphere, and, for a time, left open to public scrutiny. In general the women examined were part of a social and political elite defined by education, affluence, vocation or family background. The elite community included many, but not all, politicians and their wives, as well as some of Washington's permanent residents. Despite claims that theirs was a democratic society, the Washington political community was an elite, privileged society, ultimately governed by a proscribed etiquette.

Washington's elite society was a political society in which members of Congress, the president and members of his cabinet, Supreme Court justices, and members of the diplomatic corps met with members of the press, and other official visitors to the Capitol, and long term residents. By the end of the period covered by this study, the federal government and the planter-politicians and merchant-politicians who looked upon public service as a avocation had been replaced by professional politicians who looked upon public service as a career.
CHAPTER 1

VISIONS OF WASHINGTON IN THE PAST, 1800-1830

Infancy now beneath the twilight gloom,
Come let me lead thee o're this second Rome
Where tribunes rule, where dusky Davi bow,
And what was Goose Creek once is Tiber now:
This embryo capital, where fancy sees
Squares in morasses, obelisks in trees;
Where second-sighted seers e'en now adorn
With shrines unbuilt and heroes yet unborn
Though now but woods--and Jefferson--they see Where streets should run and sages ought to be.*

Like most American villages and towns in 1800,
Washington City was primitive by the standards of Boston, Philadelphia, New York, or European cities. Unlike most other cities, however, Washington was constructed according to a plan. As the first city designed specifically as a national capital, Washington holds a unique place among capital cities since it was founded for political ends.
In this new planned city the location of government buildings symbolized the separate, distinct branches of government. Thus geography played an important role in the development of the city and contributed to the growth of a distinctive political community. Following the original plan, a mile and a half separates the Capitol from the President’s Palace, and a mile and a half beyond the President’s is Georgetown. However, as Pierre Charles L’Enfant’s plan became a reality, financial considerations dictated changes. Instead of building the Supreme Court chambers in Judiciary Square, for example, the court was relegated to an empty room in the Capitol. From 1800 to 1830, Washington City grew from a town of 2,464 to a city of 18,826. Each census report from 1800 to 1830 showed the white population more than doubling. During these three decades a uniquely political society emerged in this city created for political ends.

9 The idea of Washington being organized according to the constitutional separation of government came from James Sterling Young’s The Washington Community, 1800-1828. Professor Young’s work suggests that separate communities emerged around the executive and legislative branches, and that most members of Congress were anxious to escape the swampy capital.

10 Within most early primary sources, "President’s Palace" denoted the President’s residence: "White House" was not commonly used during the years 1800-

The Navy Yard was three miles south of the President’s House, and southeast of the Capitol.

11 In her Sketches of History and Manners in the United States (New Haven, 1826), 137, Anne Royall notes that both the Supreme Court and the Washington, D. C. District court were designated to an apartment in the Capitol.
On January 24, 1791, George Washington informed Congress that the permanent site of the federal government would be located "between and including Georgetown and the Eastern Branch." As the federal government prepared to relocate to the federal city, many feared that there would not be sufficient accommodations for members of Congress. As early as 1796, George Walker advised Thomas Law and other speculators to construct housing close to the Capitol:

Congress must be accommodated convenient to the Capitol, it will be important that as many houses be built as near to it as possible. . . I anxiously wish that a comfortable Tavern could be built at the Capitol for it is extremely hurtful to the city that all Strangers going to see it, must go to Georgetown for accommodations. I hope that either you or Mr. Carroll will build a house for a tavern at the Capitol.

12 Bob Arnebeck, Through A Fiery Trial, 33.

Among those who heeded Walker's advice were Daniel Carroll of Duddington, Thomas Law, Robert Morris, and George Washington. When Carroll and Law attempted to drive up the price of land around the Capitol, however, investors began developing the area between the "President's Palace" and Georgetown.

Despite the use of marble chips--remaining from the construction of the Capitol and "President's Palace"--to pave parts of Pennsylvania Avenue, most streets were dirt and became muddy channels when it rained. William Craik, a member of Congress from Maryland, wrote the commissioners of Washington concerning the need to improve the streets. The questions other members of Congress most frequently asked Craik were "what is the state of the streets and how are the publick buildings situated with a view to the convenience of walking[?]" Members did not want to be bothered with long distances and muddy roads and would not "quietly submit to those difficulties which they are often satisfied to encounter at home." Craik also recommended the construction of a footpath from Georgetown to the Capitol. Sidewalks and streets continued to be a concern of Washingtonians even after Congress' arrival.

visit to Washington, the noted artist Charles Willson Peale remarked:

the roads were bad owing to the late Rains, and at all times not good because exceedingly hilly, and the system of mending them not the best to obtain much labour on them, at least such was the Case in Maryland under the Old Custom which very probably is not yet changed.

Peale described how roads were traditionally maintained by the people who lived near them. Pennsylvania’s superior roads were serviced by hired workmen who were paid through county road taxes, hence the public roads were "kept in much better repair" than in Washington.15 Roads within Washington were chiefly the responsibility of the city government, but since the city depended on a reluctant federal government for internal improvement allocations, Washington’s residents often took up subscriptions to cover the costs of needed improvements. An 1801 advertisement in the National Intelligencer informed readers and "all inhabitants and proprietors who intend to subscribe for a footway on each side of [North F] street" of a meeting at Rhode’s City Tavern.16 One resident recalled walking "to Pennsylvania Avenue, to see what is done towards the pavement--there is to be a foot way of common foundation stone--and a road thrown up with ditches to carry off the water."\(^{17}\) In 1808 a turnpike connected Washington and Alexandria, and the 1809 construction of a bridge from Maryland Avenue to Alexandria halved the travel time between the towns.\(^{18}\) By 1815, gravel footpaths marked the routes to principal boardinghouses and hotels, and made pedestrian travelling more convenient. Most residents travelled by foot, and it was common for both ladies and gentlemen to traverse the distance between the Capitol and Georgetown several times a week. During the rainy season, Washington's primitive roads and few foot paths must have reminded members of Congress of the sacrifices they made when they forsook the luxuries of Philadelphia.

As Congress' removal from Philadelphia became imminent, people flocked to the new city. Among the arrivals in 1800 were Samuel Harrison Smith of Philadelphia and his bride Margaret Bayard of Delaware, who became important figures in Washington's social and political history.\(^{19}\) Samuel Harrison Smith, the Republican editor of

Like the Smiths, Dr. William Thornton and wife Anna Maria Brodeau found a home in Washington City.

After winning the competition for the design of the Capitol building, Dr. William Thornton, his wife, and Mrs. Brodeau, her mother, moved from Philadelphia to Washington

Commonly known as Carroll Row, they were located on 1st Street between East Capitol and A Streets, SE. David Bailie Warden's A Chorographical and Statistical Description of the District of Columbia, the seat of the general GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with and engraved plan of the district, and view of the capitol (Paris: Smith, 1816), 16, argues that Washington did not have an unhealthy climate and such assertions were formed from prejudice. in 1794.\textsuperscript{22} Thornton served as a federal commissioner of Washington City, and later Superintendent of Patents. Mrs. Thornton figured prominently in Washington social circles and often assisted her husband in the completion of architectural drawings and paintings. The Thorntons lived in a New Jersey Avenue residence, rented out a house in Georgetown, and like the Smiths, maintained a farm in the country surrounding Washington City. The Smiths and the Thorntons were friends, and although they favored different political parties, both couples were important members of the developing political and social elite. These couples entertained and were entertained by members of Congress, the executive branch, and the diplomatic corps. While it is possible that many of their political acquaintances had been made in Philadelphia, the Smiths and the Thorntons proved to be architects of the Washington political community.

When the government relocated to Washington, members of Congress as well as members of the executive branch, diplomatic corps and their families became integral members of Washington’s elite and political society. Washington was not Philadelphia, and certainly members of the sixth

Congress, the first to reside in Washington, lamented the loss of the more comfortable Philadelphia boardinghouses as they arrived in a city carved out of the wilderness, a wilderness with a climate that southern and western members of Congress found more familiar than did New Englanders.

Along with aspiring bureaucrats came merchants and artisans who aided the development of Washington commerce. Christian Hines, a native of Washington, recalled that in Washington City of 1800:

The only place that had anything like the appearance of a town or village was F St. between Fifteenth Street and St. Patrick's Church.23

Businesses on F Street included a nail manufactory, John Gardner’s tailoring business—opposite Rhode’s Hotel—and Anthony Sawyer’s hair dressing establishment.24 The Federal and Columbian Masons had their lodge room on F Street and advertised their meetings in The National Intelligencer.25

As Hines’ book was written from his childhood memories, much of his information is flawed. According to Green, St. Patrick’s Church was not constructed until 1806. Constance Green, Washington, 37.

Upon Congress' arrival in October of 1800, the Capitol Hill area of New Jersey Avenue contained the Rapine and Company bookstore, a hardware store, Wilson and Handy's Cabinet and Chair Manufactory, and a theater that had opened in Blodgett's Great Hotel. The office of Samuel Harrison Smith's National Intelligencer was also located on New Jersey Avenue. Sarah M'Karaher, Mantua maker and seamstress, set up shop "within one door of Mr. Smith's printing office," and Mrs. Bempsey from New York "beg[ged] leave to inform the ladies and public in general, that she ha[d] commenced business in the City on the New Jersey Avenue, five doors from Mr. Smith's Printing office." She offered to make "ladies dresses on the shortest notice and of the newest fashion." Addletong & Fome's Grocery & Dry Good Store advertised that it was near the sugar house on New Jersey Avenue. Bottled porter & cider could be had from Gilbert Docker's establishment. While New Jersey Avenue played a major role during the first few years, Pennsylvania Avenue--THE Avenue--became the most important of Washington's thoroughfares.

By November of 1801, Washington contained 818 finished houses and 259 still under construction.¹² Still, as a visitor from New York, noted, vast expanses of land separated the clumps of buildings:

> It is said that there are 600 buildings in the city, but they are so scattered over the space of 4 miles that they make but little show. Some of them are single others in piles of 6,7 &c. one of 26 houses & if they were all placed in Pennsylvania Street between the Capitol & the President's house the distance of one mile and half, they would make a very handsome appearance. 8 years ago when we went southward this place was all a forest, except one or two plantations. We find stumps let us ride in what direction we will; but there is a road lately made from the Capitol on to the President's house & so on to Georgetown the distance of 3 miles & 2/4 which will soon be good but we have not ventured upon it yet. There is also a foot pavement of flat stone that distance.³³

Of the manufacturers, twenty-four produced boots or shoes, four made bricks, one provided oil cloth or carpeting, two built carriages and gigs, and three produced combs and buttons; the list also included four cabinet makers, one hatter, three tanners, and two soap and candle makers.\textsuperscript{36} Even with the development of manufacturing, the service industry of boarding and lodging remained the most important.

When Congress was in session, most members lived in boardinghouses or hotels―many accompanied by their wives or other relations. The letters of the members of Congress reveal that some wives spent at least part of the sessions with their husbands. In 1802 Lewis Richard Morris wrote that his wife was "so much pleased with Washington" that "she had no plans to return home." Boardinghouses were a familiar part of political life; while in Philadelphia, most members of Congress had lived in boardinghouses. As Vice President, Thomas Jefferson lodged at Conrad and McMunn's. Writing her memories of Jefferson in 1837, Margaret Bayard Smith recalled:

Our infant city offered scant accommodations for the members of Congress--There were few good boarding-houses, but Mr. Jefferson was fortunate enough to obtain one of the best. Thomas Law one of the wealthiest citizens & largest proprietors of City property, had just finished for his own use a commodious & handsome house on Capitol hill, thus on discovering the insufficiency of accommodation, he gave up to Conrad for a boardinghouse, & moved to an inconvenient dwelling on Greenleaf's point, almost two miles distant from the Capitol.

The initial Capitol Hill lodgings of Peacock's (New Jersey Avenue), Dowson's, Dunn's, Bailey's, Tim's and Frost's were later supplemented by houses on Pennsylvania Avenue between Seventh Street, West, and the foot of Capitol Hill. The newer Pennsylvania Avenue houses contained private bedrooms and "exclusive mess-tables" which kept ordinary boarders away from the Representatives and Senators.

Prior to Congress' removal to the Federal City, William and Rhoda Howell O'Neale welcomed their first child, a daughter named Margaret. Major O'Neale was a native of Trenton who had fought under General Washington in the Revolution, and as a fellow Mason, he served at the President's funeral. O'Neale had a coal yard and advertised the sale of stoves as well as food, board and lodging. His brick house on I Street between 20th and 21st, between the Capitol and Georgetown, afforded comfortable accommodations to members of Congress. Indeed, "within a few seasons," O'Neale "profited sufficiently to build an annex to his house." The annex enabled him to offer twenty separate rooms for boarders. He also offered a free coach to convey members of Congress to and from the Congress.

Capitol. O'Neale's boardinghouse and tavern eventually became one of Washington's best known establishments, and his daughter grew to be Washington's most notorious belle. While some boardinghouses closed when Congress adjourned, hotels stayed open and provided ample room for social gatherings including balls and celebratory dinners.

Three miles from the Capitol, Georgetown offered "superior lodgings," but made members dependent on hackney coaches for transportation during inclement weather.

Coaches ran daily from Georgetown and Washington to Alexandria. From 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., coaches stopped at John Cotton Smith noted that while at Baltimore's Columbian Hotel, he and his companions were asked whether they wanted a private or ordinary dinner. An ordinary dinner consisted of 100 daily diners. John Cotton Smith, Correspondences and Miscellanies, 203. Since many boardinghouses consisted of empty rooms let by either a widow or a family, meals were organized along a family pattern. Some hotels had enough room to offer private dining, whereas most boardinghouses had a single dining area.

Georgetown’s Union Tavern then proceeded to O’Neale’s Franklin House, Tennison’s and Strother’s Mansion House and back to Alexandria, six miles distant. The fare was fifty cents. The Georgetown and Annapolis stage departed from Annapolis on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and from Georgetown on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays."

Starting in the early 1800s, steamboats travelled from Washington to Philadelphia. As a guest of the statesman Joel Barlow, steamboat developer Robert Fulton used the Potomac River and the Tiber Creek to test his inventions. In 1810, Congress approved his use of the Hall of Representatives for a display of torpedoes and a lecture on their use. Steamboats in 1815 used McKowen’s Pennsylvania Avenue and 6th Street Hotel dock as a return point.

Politics was a public spectacle. Most visitors and residents of Washington had some connection to the federal government. Benjamin Henry Latrobe was responsible for the completion of both the Senate’s and Representatives’ chambers in the Capitol, thus creating a theater for the political spectators who assembled to watch the spectacle of Congress. From 1803 to 1811, Benjamin Latrobe served as Surveyor of Public Buildings and Architect of the Capitol of the United States. He worked with members of Congress and District of Columbia officials to secure funds for the improvement and completion of public buildings. Latrobe also accepted private commissions, and by 1807 he finished the construction of Christ's Church, which along with St. Patrick's and a Methodist Church at the Navy Yard, provided Washington with religious services.

Previously, members of Congress and the general public had assembled at the House of Representatives for services. Congressman John Cotton Smith recalled:

Congress Hall ... was devoted to religious service on the Lord's day, and as many members, unhappily, felt themselves under no particular obligation to occupy their seats on that day, there was room to accommodate such of the citizens as were disposed to attend. The chaplains, on all occasions, acquitted themselves to general acceptance.

British Ambassador Augustus John Foster found that while 1812 Capitol Church services were not "an amusement," considering "the variety of persons who were allowed to preach in the House of Representatives there was some alloy of curiosity in the motives which led one to go there to hear it. For tho' the regular chaplain is a Presbyterian, a Methodist, a minister of the Church of England, or a Quaker, and sometimes even a woman took the Speaker's chair." He did not find most members of Congress to be overly pious. Over the ensuing two decades, Washington added a Presbyterian Church, a Unitarian Church, and two Baptist Churches. The Presbyterian Church on South Capitol Street in 1820 became an African Methodist Episcopal Church. Leisure time activities, often politically motivated, attracted people from all over Washington. Church, the theater, and even races presented the elite with the opportunity to see and be seen by other members of society.

Washington’s first theater, located within Blodgett’s Hotel, opened in 1800. Thomas Law gave the inaugural performance with the recitation of "The off spring of a few of Mr. Law’s leisure moments". Mrs. Thornton’s diary for 1800 records Cumberland’s The Wheel of Fortune, Blue Beard, Sheridan’s translation of Pizaro, and Thomas Moreton’s Cure for the Heart among the other performances. By 1804 subscriptions funded construction of a real theater on 11th and C Streets, N.W.. Although Washington could not support its own troupe, actors from Baltimore and Philadelphia performed each season until 1820 when a fire destroyed the theater. Lewis Caursi purchased the property and in 1822, opened the Washington City Assembly Rooms—a dancing hall. Dancing proved popular in both Washington and Georgetown. An 1800 edition of the National Intelligencer noted that the Washington Assembly met at Mr. Stelle's Hotel every two weeks on Thursdays at "half after five." Washington theater resumed in 1821 with the construction of a new building on Louisiana Avenue between 4 1/2 Street and 6th Street. During his 1824 visit, Lafayette attended a show at the new theater. Other popular diversions included horse races and card playing, two forms of gambling which even the most respectable people enjoyed.

During the August 1814 British invasion, most Washingtonians and members of Congress fled to the countryside. The British burned all of the public buildings with the exception of the General Post Office and the Patent Office, which were housed together. Dr. William Thornton, Superintendent of Patents, convinced Col. Jones that more would be lost than gained from the destruction of this warehouse of knowledge:

Dr. T. went to the city & by his exertions, saved the patent office from destruction—they were on the point of setting it on fire & he represented to the officer (Col. Jones) that it was the museum of the arts & that it

Besides the loss of the President's Palace and Capitol, the early Library of Congress and its valuable collection of books were destroyed. Elias Boudinot Caldwell, a clerk of the Supreme Court saved the archives of the court from the flames of the Capitol. The British also burned the Eastern Branch Bridge, part of the Potomac Bridge and the rope walks--between the Navy Yard and the Arsenal.\textsuperscript{59}

Following the War of 1812, Congress debated moving the capital to an already established city, such as Philadelphia. Residents of Washington and members of the congressional community, however, realized that the British would view such a move as the result of a crippling attack on the capital of the United States. Congressman Joseph Pearson of North Carolina thought that removal would break "this strongest link in the federal chain." Consequently, residents began Washington's reconstruction. Daniel Carroll of Duddington, Thomas Law, and Henry Ingle built a structure known as the Brick Capitol--as a temporary meeting place for Congress--on the southwest corner of 1st and A Streets, the former site of Tunnicliffe's Tavern.\textsuperscript{60}

The Capitol was not totally rebuilt until 1825 and during the interim private citizens offered their residences for the various executive departments. President and Mrs. Madison removed to Colonel Tayloe’s New York Avenue Octagon House; the Treasury Department took over the former residence of the British Minister Augustus Foster; the Department of State borrowed Judge Gabriel Duval’s home; and Mr. Mechlin donated his house near Western Market to the Department of the Navy.\(^61\) Mrs. Suter’s boardinghouse at 18th and F Streets became the Bank of the Metropolis, and she moved her business to Pennsylvania Avenue. In 1815 the Senate passed a bill for the reconstruction of executive offices on their former sites.\(^62\) The Supreme Court and circuit courts appropriated the upper floor of the Capitol Hill Market until the Capitol was repaired. Eliza Parke Custis, Thomas Law’s former wife, reported Washington’s 1815 population as "around 12,000." To her good friend and confidant, David Bailie Warden, Custis wrote, "houses are rising in every direction; Pennsylvania

As territories became states, Congress and the other branches of the federal government grew. Washington City grew along with the population and by 1830, had become a capital city of which the country was proud. "Washington City was," wrote Augustus Foster, "the most agreeable town to reside in for any length of time of all those which I have seen in the United States."\(^6^4\) Writing to her sister in 1814, Margaret Bayard Smith commented:

Washington possesses a peculiar interest and to an active, reflective, and ambitious mind, has more attractions than any other place in America. This interest is daily increasing, and with the importance and expansion of our nation, this is the theatre on which its most interesting interests are discuss'd, by its ablest sons, in which its greatest characters are called to act, it is every year, more and more the resort of strangers from every part of the union, and all foreigners of distinction who visit these states likewise visit this city."

Mrs. Frances Trollope, a most discerning member of the diplomatic corps and one of those "strangers" from Britain, seemed to agree when she remarked of the city in 1830:

Washington may be scorned as a metropolis, where such cities as Philadelphia and New York exist;

but I consider it a growing metropolis of the growing population of the Union and it already possess features enough to sustain its dignity as such.

Not all accounts of the federal city were so complimentary. David Bailie Warden provides one of the most provoking comments on negative descriptions of Washington.

Travellers, from different motives, have given very unfaithful pictures of the city of Washington. The buildings are described to be in a state of dilapidation. The inhabitants are represented as a 'half-organised, half-minded race;' although it is well known, that they came from various regions of the United States, and from different countries of Europe, bringing with them qualities of mind and body, and topographical habits, which prevent the possibility of any characteristic trait, except in the imagination of the poet.

Even in its infancy, Washington City attracted people. Congress provided the city with a transient, almost captive, population. Most members of Congress spent more than one term in office. Some became senators, others served as members of the executive cabinet, or the judiciary. The persistence of these officials within the federal government suggests the rise of professional politicians, and their persistence within Washington led to the growth of a unique community.

MESSING AROUND WASHINGTON: CONGRESS, LODGING AND SOCIAL INTERCOURSE

The greatest and the most respectable business that is done in Washington, is keeping boarding houses. Most of the families that possess, or can obtain, sufficient means of setting up a house in that style that is now required to meet encouragement, will take boarders, and I must do them the justice to say, that they generally understand their business, and it is better done at Washington, than in any of the largest cities in the United States.--E. Cooley

[T]hose who keep the Congress boarders, even the females, are a savage, fierce looking people, and the most detestable in their manners of any to be found, either black, white or red; the Cherokees and Choctaws are a polished people compared with them.--Anne Royall™

People from all over the world flocked to see the new capital city and to meet America’s political elite. Visitors ranged from inquisitive travelogue writers and affluent foreigners on tours to citizens seeking war pensions or other government favors. Many of these visitors found lodgings in the boardinghouses and hotels where members of Congress also resided. As politicians flocked to the federal capital of Washington, the boardinghouse and hotel groups they formed provided these new arrivals with both lodging and companionship. These groups often reflected existing friendships and political or sectional alliances. It is these relationships which gave mess memberships meaning and contributed to the growth of a permanent political society in the new capital.

As the federal city matured during its first thirty years, so did Congress. With the Capitol building as its permanent headquarters, Congress allocated funds for a library, hired clerks, and allowed stenographers to record its debates. As procedures became codified and committees considered petitions and drafted resolutions, the machine of national politics wheezed into action.

From 1800 to 1830, the several states sent 1,477 Representatives and Senators to Washington. The initial group of 138 legislators who trickled into the city were dismayed by the primitive conditions they found. Nevertheless, the federal city offered its residents a variety of diversions, and those Congressional wives fortunate enough to accompany their husbands joined in the amusements of the social season and provided members of

During this period, the number of seats in the House increased from 106 to 213 and from thirty-two to forty-eight in the Senate. Of the 1,477 Representatives and Senators, the simple average of terms in Congress was 2.5 terms or five years. If single term members are excluded, 902 members served a simple average of 3.5 terms or seven years in office. With a life expectancy of around fifty-five for males, seven years represents a significant period of time. Fourteen members served between ten and sixteen terms during the thirty two year period between the Sixth to Twenty-first Congresses. See Appendix A, Terms in Office.
Congress a respite from the homesickness they so often referred to in their letters.⁷⁰

Most Congressmen, however, could not bring their families to Washington, due either to the distance involved or to a lack of funds. Lonely and uncomfortable, these unaccompanied members wrote their loved ones and described their plight. Representative Albert Gallatin described his situation on Capitol Hill as "far from pleasant or even convenient."⁷¹ Representative Louis McLane expressed his loneliness in letter to his wife Catherine, Kitty.

> I seek a substitute for wife and children in vain--the brilliant displays of the drawing-room, and the gay and lively scenes of the French ministers Saturday night--afford me but little pleasure, and I go more as a duty... than from any other motive. If I could take you under my arm, and eclipse all these mock quality, I should go through the routine with some patience.⁷²

Isolated from friends and family, most members of Congress and other federal officials sought accommodations in Washington's boardinghouses and hotels. As members joined together in these houses and hotels, they formed groups known as messes.⁷³

⁷³ For an explanation of the origin of the term "mess," see chapter 1, note 32.
Several variables influenced mess selection. Aside from the normal considerations of cost and location, the reputation of the boardinghouse, its residents, and its proprietor influenced members of Congress, cabinet officials, and other potential boarders. Other factors included the home states and political affiliations of the residents. Members tended to live with at least one other member of their state delegations.

Boardinghouses ranged from the select houses of Washington's social elite to homes of pious widows and shopkeepers, and varied in size from two to twenty boarders. Some houses boarded only members of Congress and their families, while others accepted transients as well. According to one author, boardinghouses gained their respectability from "members of Congress and their families," "judges of the supreme court of the United States, and all the distinguished strangers who visit Washington." Because members of Congress paid "about a third more than transient boarders," they had their choice of rooms.

By 1805, congressional directories distinguished between private residences and boardinghouses, thus

Nevertheless, boardinghouses placed boarders on intimate terms with the proprietor's family. Typically, wrote E. Cooley, "one of the family" sat at the head of the table

76 Private residences ranged from houses rented by an individual for his own use, to houses where an individual was rented or lent a room. Those with relatives in Washington, such as Representative Joseph Desha, often resided with their families. See the PRs in Appendix D.

77 The locations for the various directories were found in Meredith B. Colket, Jr., "The Early Congressional Directories", 70-80. The actual directory lists derive from those found in Perry M. Goldman and James S. Young's The United States Congressional Directories 1789-1840 and the directories listed in the list of sources consulted. and did "the honours of the table." Widows with daughters--some of whom married members of Congress--ran most boardinghouses. Manasseh Cutler and his Federalist messmates enjoyed the companionship of the King family. Cutler noted of the daughter of his landlord--seventeen-year-old Anna King--that she had "been educated in the best schools in Baltimore and Alexandria," and although she "did not converse much," he found her "modest" and "agreeable." Cutler and his mess-mates spent some of their leisure hours with King and his family, and enjoyed listening to Anna’s skilled singing and "forte piano" playing, and they often spent their evenings singing hymns with the King family. Representative William T. Barry (R,KY) also recalled spending some evenings listening to Margaret, boardinghouse-keeper William O’Neale’s daughter, play the piano at the Franklin House.

Journalist and travelogue writer Anne Royall described the business of boardinghouses differently than Cooley, Unlike those politely accepted in the highest social circles, Anne Royall wrote to earn a living, and parleyed peoples' responses to her, into material for her books, which she sold by subscription. Royall noted that banks owned many boardinghouses because of defaulted loans.

Most of the houses of the city belong to the banks; in consequence of their having advanced the money to erect them, the builder being unable to refund the money, the houses became the property of the banks. These houses they rent out to needy adventurers, who purchase a carpet or two or three dozen tables and chairs, hire a score of free negroes, and take in members of Congress as boarders. This enables them to pay for their furniture and servants, and go to market. Thus they are no more than a chief cook and butler... They live like princes during the winter [when Congress is in session], but have pinching times all summer.

A private letter from Sophia Towson which described how the Graff family opened a boardinghouse, corroborates with Royall's observations. The Graffs opened their boardinghouse with only "one bedstead, 6 chairs, and a few articles of kitchen furniture." Credit provided more furniture "as Mr. Graff had not one dollar on hand to purchase with" and had given up his grocery store.

81 Anne Royall, Sketches, 170.
82 Sophia Towson was the daughter of Caleb Bingham, a noted Boston educator and the wife of Nathan Towson, an army officer.
83 No record of the Graff boardinghouse could be located.
A Mrs. Munroe owned the house, and she offered to sell them her furniture for $250.00, "if they would take the house off her hands."

Hotels provided members with an atmosphere different from the smaller, more personal boardinghouses. Hotels accommodated more guests and provided greater privacy and exclusive dining areas for special groups. Margaret Bayard Smith penned the earliest description of a Washington hotel in a letter to her father and family. She and her husband Samuel Harrison Smith arrived in the city, the final destination of their wedding journey, in October 1800. They took lodgings at Pontius Stelle's Hotel, which occupied the middle house of three three-story houses built by Daniel Carroll. Commonly known as Carroll's Row, the houses were located on First Street between East Capitol and A Streets, Southeast.

At last I perceive the Capitol, a large square, ungraceful building, approaching nearer I see three large brick houses & a few hovels scattered over the plains. One of the brick houses, is the one where we lodge. . . . I alight, am introduced to Mr. St[e]ll[e] & led into a large handsome parlour. . . . The windows [of the chamber] look upon the scene I described, it is a western exposure & as I enter'd the rays of the setting sun fell upon the white walls. A neat bed with a

While most members of Congress mentioned the location of their residences, few wrote of the differences between boardinghouses and hotels. Levi Woodbury, however, offered an insight into the considerations which influenced the choices between boarding options. An impending visit by his wife Elizabeth left Woodbury contemplating what was available. "Gadsby’s rooms," he wrote, "are very convenient--parlour & chambers opening into each other--on the 2nd floor & nicely furnished."

But coal fires--not fronting on the avenue & $15 pr. week to each person--Mrs. Peyton is all smiles. . . We can lodge as last Winter & same parlour--& Frances have Mrs. Polk’s chambers--same price as last winter. . . Mr. McLane of Delaware takes rooms near Mrs. Clark’s in F street & wishes our neighborhood--at Mrs. Miller’s.\(^{87}\)

In December 1829, Woodbury selected Gadsby’s Hotel. Gadsby’s was considered to be one of the finest hotels in the United States. Contrasting hotel life to boardinghouse life, he wrote, "I like their independence and freedom. . . all that--one finds at a large public table in a crowded hotel. One there also sees every body or nobody, pretty much as the whim of the moment may dictate." His chamber contained carpet, "two looking glasses--a fair bed & curtains"--was kept "warm and neat" and overlooked Fifth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, Northwest. The hotel also contained a reading room, where Woodbury often retired to pore over his books and papers. Woodbury further noted the differences between hotels and boardinghouses, stressing his preference for the independence of hotel life.

It is really amazing to see the difference between a great public table like that in this immense Hotel and any private boardinghouse. Here nobody helps or is helped; thanks one for this or that; carves turkey or beef; but all is done through servants. . . . You say good morning or evening to 20 or none as you please--and to 3 or 4 or mainly eat & talk loudly & display, or listen & play. . . . P.S. Mr. Calhoun arrived alone this morning and wants to make a mess here with me & a few others--I am asked to go to Mrs. Cottringer's--and several other places--but doubt if I quit Gadsby's.

Some members experimented with boarding options. When Josiah Quincy (F, MA) arrived, he chose to stay with William Cranch and his family rather than lodge in a public house.

Having ascertained the exceeding want of accommodation for a private family at Washington . . . and the many difficulties of keeping a house, and the utter discomfort and want of security from intrusion in the boarding-houses, I had made an arrangement with Judge Cranch to receive me and Mrs. Quincy, with one child, into his family, with sufficient adjoining accommodation for my coachman, horses and carriage.

Later, during the Ninth Congress, Quincy sans famille, joined his friend Benjamin Tallmadge in Mr. Coyle’s boardinghouse. Quincy so disliked the noise and intrusions of boardinghouses, that a year later, he and Senator James Lloyd (F, MA) rented a private house on Capitol Hill. They brought their own servants, and a hotel supplied their “culinary wants.”

We arrived at Washington the 5th of November, and took possession of our house with the self-congratulations of ownership. It had been well provided with furniture, and all our arrangements proved satisfactory. . . . My personal situation at Washington was never so eligible, except during those sessions when my family was with me. Our house was our own; we were relieved from the noise and intrusion incident to a boardinghouse. . . . We had our whole time at our disposal, and were free from interruption.

Cost, location, and the condition of the house, as Representative John Fairfield’s letters show, also mattered. Although Fairfield’s search took place in 1835, his account describes houses which existed in 1830 and provides an excellent example of the difficulties of finding suitable lodgings. Fairfield found Mrs.

Harabaugh's to be an "excellent mess," with "Messrs. Grundy & Robinson of the Senate, Mann of N.Y., Johnson of Ten. and Conner of N.C. of the House," but she wanted ten dollars for a third-story room almost half a mile from the Capitol. Mrs. D[o]wson's location near the Capitol was appealing, but her house was old and in bad repair. Fairfield finally decided on Mrs. Hill's Pennsylvania Avenue house--"good location--good house--good furniture--fine looking, smart landlady--and a pretty good mess of New Yorkers and Connecticuters"--for eight dollars. Fairfield noted that with the exception of one "opposition man," his mess was composed of "all good democrats."

The quest for comfortable lodgings took members all over the city--at times forcing them to return to Washington early in order to procure satisfactory accommodations. Manesseh Cutler, General William Shepard (F,MA), and George Upham (F,NH) took lodgings with the Speake's on Pennsylvania Avenue--near the Eastern Branch--in 1802, and paid six and a half dollars per week. By doing so, he believed he "found better accommodations than [he] probably could have had [he] tarried home another week," though he lamented the loss of additional time at home. He took a chamber at Mr. Peltz's on Pennsylvania Avenue during both the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Congresses. During the Fourteenth Congress, Brigham paid eleven dollars per week for a private room, one dollar less than his brother-in-law, Representative Artemis Ward, had paid for the same room a year before.

In the three miles separating Capitol Hill and Georgetown, three primary groupings of houses and hotels arose surrounding the Capitol, the President's House, and Georgetown. Capitol Hill appealed to members of Congress because of its convenience. Those who lived on the Hill did not depend upon coaches or horses for transportation to Congress. After spending several months at Conrad and McMunn's, Secretary of the Treasury Albert Gallatin moved Barnabus Bidwell joined his friends at Macken’s house on Capitol Hill, next to Albert Gallatin’s house. Bidwell shared his chamber with General Joseph Varnum. Their room contained good beds, a fireplace and "tables and other accommodations for writing and study." Below, boarders mingled in a common parlor.

Manasseh Cutler, who also lived on the Hill, recorded a description of his residence in a letter to his daughter, Betsy. Cutler boarded with the family of Nicholas King, four doors south of Stelle’s, during the Seventh Congress.

The block in which I live contains six houses, four stories high, and very handsomely furnished. It is situated east of the Capitol, on the highest ground in the city. Mr. King, our landlord, occupies the south end, only one room in the front, which is our parlor for receiving company and dining, and one room in the back, occupied by Mr. King’s family, the kitchen is below. The four chambers are appropriated to eight gentlemen who board in the family. In each chamber are two narrow field beds and field curtains, with every necessary convenience for the boarders. Established in 1751, Georgetown provided early Washington with shops and taverns. Catharine Mitchell characterized Georgetown as a "great resort" for the ladies on account of all of the shops. She found the settlement "very compact," and a "place of considerable business" which was growing rapidly. Southern members often roomed in Georgetown, despite a daily expenditure of at least one dollar for a hackney coach to Capitol Hill and back, a situation which Harrison Gray Otis found to be "inconvenient. . .vile and expensive." The area around the President's House contained diplomatic residences and was equally convenient to both Georgetown and Capitol Hill. Margaret Bayard Smith, a permanent resident of Washington, suggested that Joel Barlow take rooms with a Mrs. Doyne on Pennsylvania Avenue, near the President’s house.

Mrs. Doyne kept a boarding house. I have interested myself very much for her and recommended her to Mr. Barlow, he has taken a parlour and bed room which are very neatly furnished, and the stable,—he pays her 40 dollars a week for himself, wife and 2 servants, besides them she has 10 gentlemen at 10 dollars a week only for board and lodging, as they find fuel, candles, etc. and so I think she will do very well. We have all the surrounding houses filled, but I have not yet become acquainted with many of my new neighbors. Dr. Mitchell lives directly opposite and we have several ladies next door.

Dr. Samuel Latham Mitchell first came to Washington in 1803 as a Republican Representative from New York. Later in that session, he learned of his selection for the Senate, where he served for the remainder of the Eighth Congress and the four succeeding Congresses. Mitchell’s wife, Catharine Akerly Mitchell, accompanied him to the federal city for portions of three of those terms—normally during winter, the social season.

In 1808, the Mitchills again resided at Mrs. Doyne’s Pennsylvania Avenue house, where Catharine Mitchell anticipated the arrival of more congressional wives. "The congressmen are flocking in here every day," she reported to her sister, "a number of them have brought their wives, Sarah Willson, who kept a house within Pennsylvania Avenue's Seven Buildings, actually wrote to Secretary of State Benjamin Crowninshield offering him a room in her house. Crowninshield's brother Jacob, while serving as a Representative, boarded with Mrs. Willson from the Eighth until the Tenth Congress. He moved "because [Mrs. Willson] was removed too far from the Capitol." returned to Washington as a Representative in 1823, he again lodged with Mrs. Willson, before moving to Mrs. Eliza Clarke’s on F Street for the Nineteenth Congress and the first session of the Twentieth Congress, and then to Mrs. Blake’s on Eighth Street near Centre Market for the second session of the Twentieth Congress and the first session of the Twenty-first Congress. Mrs. Royall found Eliza Clarke to be "quite a genteel" widow."

Crowninshield’s movements reveal that residences as well as fellow residents, changed frequently in Washington.

The reputation of proprietors, often determined the quality of clientele they drew. Thus descriptions of houses and hotels by writers like Anne Royall or British visitor Henry Bradshaw Fearon, might affect business. Royall characterized Alfred Dowson’s as "one of the meanest boarding houses in the city," and Nicholas Queen "another mean man." "[F]or the benefit of strangers," she listed Captain Burch, B. O. Tyler, Mrs. Carlisle, Mr. Tims, Mr. Brown, John Gadsby "and particularly Tennison and N[oah]

Fletcher," as "worthy of patronage," and suggested that they "richly merit[ed]" the public's confidence."¹⁰⁶ Henry Bradshaw Fearon, however, did not recommend Davis's Indian Queen Tavern. He noted broken door-handles, and crumbling walls and ceilings, and prices "as high as at the very first London hotel." Consequently, Fearon elected to lodge at Mrs. Lindsay's New Jersey Avenue house.¹⁰⁷

Another proprietor, Robert Bailey, was a needy adventurer much like those Royall described. In 1807

¹⁰⁶ Anne Royall, Black Book, 127. Dowson's was located on New Jersey Avenue and A Street, North, fronting Capitol Square. These houses, also known as the Ten Buildings, which were owned by Thomas Law, had several proprietors over the years, including Conrad and McMunn, Robert Peacock, and Robert Bailey. Nicholas Queen resided on East Capitol and A Streets, North. Captain Burch lived north-east of the Capitol, as did B. O. Tyler, whose address was A Street, North, fronting Capitol Square. Mrs. Carlisle resided on Pennsylvania Avenue, between Four-and-a-half and Sixth Streets, West. Mr. Henry Tims, Doorkeeper of the Senate, lived on A Street, South, which also fronted Capitol Square. Brown's Indian Queen Hotel was located on Pennsylvania Avenue between Sixth and Seventh Streets, on either square 460, or 491, as was Gadsby's hotel. Tennison dwelled on Tenth Street, West, between D and E Streets, North. Noah Fletcher abided east of the General Post Office, on E Street, North, between Sixth and Seventh Streets, West. Part of Mrs. Royall's dislike for Nicholas Queen may have stemmed from her hatred of Catholics. See Appendix D for a list of boardinghouse residents.

Robert Bailey left his wife and children in Virginia to set up housekeeping with a Mrs. Turnbull. Mrs. Turnbull took in boarders and Bailey kept a faro table in their Georgetown house. Eventually, Bailey rented their boardinghouse to William Crawford of Georgetown; in turn Crawford's house became the Union Hotel. Bailey "sumptuously" entertained "members of Congress and other respectable personages" at his "private dwelling" where "they would amuse themselves with loo, whist, &c."

During the Thirteenth Congress, Bailey and some partners rented all of Thomas Law's New Jersey Avenue house--the Ten Buildings--on Capitol Hill in an attempt to fix room prices. When his partners gave into congressional pressure to lower their prices, Bailey's scam failed, and he could not pay his bills and gambling debts.

108 See "Crawford's Hotel" in Appendix D.

110 Law's houses were initially rented to Conrad and McMunn, and later Robert Peacock. See Appendix D. Mrs. William Thornton's diary mentions that Thomas Law rented out two houses for $2,000.00 a year. With boardinghouses containing at least four tenants, to cover Law's lease, each of the two houses would need four boarders paying a minimum of ten dollars and fifty cents per week for six months. Mrs. Thornton also cites her neighbor Joshua Johnson as paying $500 per year for rent of a house on F Street. Mrs. William Thornton, "The Diary of Mrs. Thornton," 180, 134.
Subsequently, Bailey's creditors "applied in vain for their dues," and some of them "obtained [a] judgement against him." Bailey's ill-fated venture, and his propensity for gambling, eventually resulted in his imprisonment for debt. His remaining tenants left as firewood and food became scarce. While debt itself did not evoke the disapproval of polite society, Bailey's unrestrained gambling and his extra-martial affairs, ensured his rejection by the leaders of Congressional society.

In contrast to the morally questionable Bailey, Nancy Cranch, daughter of Judge William Cranch, found Mrs. Matilda Owen Bestor, wife of postal clerk Harvey Bestor, to be a worthy moral example. After calling on Mrs. Bestor, Nancy recorded the visit in her diary.

Mrs. B. has a family, and keeps boarders: and yet she finds time to do a great deal of good by nursing the sick & comforting all about her by kind offices--cousin E[mily] says that she is very pious--May such women, even tho' they may not be found in the highest walks of life be my

As with the proprietor's reputation, the reputation of the residents was important to mess members. As in private clubs or fraternities, admission to a boardinghouse or hotel mess could be vetoed by the existing membership. Vice President Daniel Tompkin's love of drink caused his rejection by Harrison Gray Otis's mess. Louis McLane thought that Tompkins bore "the most evident and conclusive marks of a sot," which precluded his acceptance.\textsuperscript{113} Attorney Luther Martin, a notorious alcoholic, left Lang's Hotel in 1810 because the mess residing there objected to associating with him. Like clubs or fraternal organizations, messes provided members with a private arena in which to discuss the business of government. Members spent many of their leisure hours in their boardinghouses and hotels which fostered a camaraderie from which both political and personal benefits derived.\textsuperscript{115}

Boardinghouse associations also occasionally provided members with protection from disgruntled constituents. Following consideration of a compensation bill that would have resulted in higher taxes, Representative Joseph Desha's constituents demanded to know his position on the bill. Representative Richard M. Johnson (R,KY) wrote Desha that while riding through Desha's district, he was questioned about Desha's vote on it. Johnson responded that he did not recall how Desha had voted.\textsuperscript{116} His other messmates were more helpful. Senator James J. Wilson (R,NJ), a mess-mate of Desha's, described a conversation he had with Desha's constituents. Wilson affirmed to Desha:

McLean recalled frequent conversations and Desha’s statements that a pay raise was "improper" and that "the consequences might be injurious to the [R]epublican party." Darlington too cited "frequent and unreserved conversations" in which Desha was "explicitly and decidedly hostile to the compensation bill in every stage of its progress through the House." Within their house, in "free and repeated discussions," Desha spoke of the bill with "uniform terms of reprobation."\textsuperscript{118} Just as mess alliances protected members, messes disciplined those who did not support their fellow messmates. The contest for the presidency in 1826 became an issue for the mess at Peck’s hotel, when the election was thrown into the House of Representatives. Even though the Peck mess agreed to support William H. Crawford, New York Representative Stephen Van Rensselaer cast his vote for John Quincy Adams despite his pledge to vote for Crawford. Louis McLane related to Margaret Bayard Smith the events surrounding the vote:

Genl. V. R. has for two years been one of our mess. He has betrayed those with whom he broke bread. We conversed before and confided in him as one of ourselves. He always professed himself one in our views, our plans, our hopes, and this very morning, not half an hour before he betrayed us, he pledged me his word of honor, that he would not vote for Adams.¹¹⁹

Despite his vow of support to William Archer (CR, VA) and Senator Martin Van Buren (CR, NY) shortly before the vote, Van Rensselaer voted for Adams. Upon learning of Van Rensselaer's "falsehood, deceit, [and] treachery" McLane shunned him. Back at the mess Van Rensselaer asked for forgiveness, but McLane turned away.

A similar scene took place with V. B. and the other gentlemen of the mess, we let him continue with us, sit at the same table with us, but we do not speak to him. He is beneath anything but contempt, and he is an old man.¹²⁰

Van Renssealer remained at Mrs. Cottringers for the first session of the Twentieth Congress, without either McLane or Van Buren, and the returned to Williamson's for the second session.
brother being challenged, Van Rensselaer's messmates sought to teach him the importance of loyalty.

William Darlington and James J. Wilson, two of Desha's mess-mates, show that some members attempted to organize their messes prior to their arrival in Washington. The two men met during the War of 1812, and when they both obtained offices in Washington, Wilson wrote to Darlington to discuss the possibility of their rooming together. "It will give me great pleasure," wrote Wilson, "if we can quarter together at Washington." Wilson hoped that Darlington's skill as a physician and care as a friend would help preserve his "fragile constitution." He also suggested taking rooms with Mr. Myer to be near the Capitol, and since Wilson's brother had formerly boarded there, he had "witnessed" Mr. Myer's "attention and providence." Wilson also remarked that "several of Pennsylvania's members already board there—and if [they could] crowd in, without any of them out," he would be "much pleased." Darlington and Wilson resided together throughout Darlington's tenure in the House—the Fourteenth through Seventeenth Congresses. In 1817, Wilson was located in his "old quarters"—Mrs. Salome Myer's House—along with Joseph Desha (R,KY), Joseph Heister (R,PA), James M. Wallace (R,PA), Colonel Whitencle, Senator James Noble (R,IN), and General Schulyer. Three places remained available.\(^{123}\) Wilson stayed at Mrs. Meyer's until his resignation.\(^{124}\) In a letter, Wilson indicated his approval of Darlington's decision to remain with Mrs. Myer.

I am glad you remain with Meyer, for I truly believe, notwithstanding to me disagreeable occurrences, that you would not be as contented anywhere else; and she deserves encouragement for her persevering exertions to maintain her family respectability.\(^ {125}\)

As a friendship forged during the War of 1812, the Wilson-Darlington relationship suggests that indeed, some messes came together through previous relationships and continued beyond service in Washington.

During the recess between the Ninth and Tenth Congresses, John Cotton Smith wrote Josiah Quincy of his pleasure in their friendship:

I am both happy and proud to abjure the opinion that friendship, to be ardent and durable, must be exclusively the production of early life. My acquaintance with you, I trust, has furnished an ample refutation to this erroneous sentiment, and I deem a six winter's exile a cheap purchase of so valuable a discovery. . . . I do feel a pang in separating from that noble band of chevaliers, who small as their number is, have become only depositaries of their country's honor. Nor will I conceal the tender emotions which agitate my breast at the recollection of the charming hours I have passed not many miles from the eastern branch of the Potomac. Imagination will long delight itself in recalling the hospitable salutation, the undissembled courtesy, the wisdom, and the wit, which enlivened and endeared and rendered ever memorable those evenings. But this is a theme I must not pursue. It shall be resumed when we meet. 126

Residents and political alliances also tempted members to change residences. In 1817, Louis McLane of Delaware resided at Miss Heyer's. To his wife Kitty, McLane wrote that Outerbridge Horsey was anxious to have McLane and Kitty in a mess along with Rufus King and Harrison Gray Otis. A month later, McLane toyed with the idea of moving to Mrs. Queen's on Capitol Hill where Senator William Hunter (F,RI), and his wife resided. However, with Mrs. Fromentin, wife of Senator Eligius Fromentin (R,LA) also present, McLane dismissed the idea because she was "so ill natured and so abominable, that she would be intolerable." Thus to avoid the company of Mrs. Fromentin, McLane chose to remain at Miss Heyer's. 127

McLane returned to Heyer's for the second session of the Fifteenth Congress, where he was miserable and homesick. McLane compared his situation to that of Harrison Gray Otis' mess, and contemplated his options.

[I] am by no means certain that I shall remain here that long. My room is so cold, open, small and uncomfortable, and the accommodation at Otis's mess so superior that I have not entirely made up my mind to desert them. Besides excepting Hopkinson & Sargent, Miss Heyer's house offers no inducements and I feel a great inclination to depart from Messrs. V[an] Dyke and Pauling.

A month later McLane informed his wife that he had received a letter from Harrison Gray Otis, telling him that a room was ready "and offering a very cordial and, handsome invitation to join his mess." McLane accepted, and he joined Rufus King, Harrison Gray Otis, Outerbridge Horsey, and ten others at Crawford's Union Hotel in Georgetown.128

A few years later, Otis received a letter from a John H. Hensham, a gentleman who acted as Otis' agent in procuring lodging at the Union Hotel. Hensham informed Otis that a Mr. Brady had rented the hotel. A letter from Richard Ruggles confirmed Hensham's information and mentioned that Mr. Brady had replaced William Crawford. John H. Members without pre-existing ties either to Washington or to the political community sought messes where ideologically compatible individuals resided. One member described his friendships as such:

> Our association on the floor, and at times in our respective lodgings, led to the reciprocation of friendships which remained intimate and cordial during the continuance of our mutual Congress life, but were soon broken by our subsequent separation in different and often far-distant States. . . . With the friends of the Administration, who at that time composed the great majority of Congress, my intercourse for the most part was polite, but cold and general. The leaders of that party both from the South and the West were violent, overbearing, and insolent.\textsuperscript{131}

While affiliation to a particular party did not preclude associations with persons of different ideological orientations, members of Congress tended to socialize with their political compatriots. Representative Lewis Richard Morris (F, VT) wrote William Meredith that his accommodations were "very comfortable and the company which compose our mess very agreeable. . .we are all of one sentiment and appear predisposed to make it as agreeable to each other as possible."\textsuperscript{111} Manasseh Cutler described his mess as a family, and described Samuel Taggart (F, MA), who roomed with him, as his "good brother, . . .possessed of a strong mind and sound politics."\textsuperscript{113} Representative Harrison Gray Otis (F, MA) appreciated having Representative David Ogden (F, NY) in his mess because he conformed "readily to [Otis’] views and mode of living."\textsuperscript{114} Of the 506 boardinghouse and hotel groups of the Seventh through the Twenty-first Congresses, only ten exhibited mixed-party membership. Clearly, political affiliations mattered a lot to mess members.\textsuperscript{135}

Senator William Plumer acknowledged the role of subtle gamesmanship in politics. He also realized that transcending political prejudices could prove beneficial. Plumer knew that by visiting members of the opposing party—the Republicans—he could reap valuable information.

Our Federal gentlemen generally decline visiting the Republican members, and so vice versa. I visit my political opponents freely, converse with them, avoid disputes, and obtain much useful information from them. My rule is to ask many questions, to converse cautiously and negatively on important subjects, and to display on subjects not important, much frankness. Whenever I answer a question, I do it correctly; for I abhor duplicity. But a politician is bound to act cautiously and not less to be on guard in conversation with his opponents.\textsuperscript{136}

Plumer also found strict political divisions between guests at presidential dinners during Jefferson's administrations. Each dinner consisted of approximately ten specially selected members of Congress—House and Senate—all from the same party. Plumer disliked institutionalized political divisions and sought to overcome them. "The more men of good hearts associate, the better they think of each other, notwithstanding their differences of opinion."137 Josiah Quincy took another approach. Quincy described his behavior in Congress as "regulated by party rather than friendship."

Letters from members also reveal strong regional sentiments. In a note to the recently departed Josiah Quincy, Artemis Ward wrote that he had returned to Captain Coyle’s house and had taken the "front upper chamber."

"Coyle’s family," it seems, had undergone "a total change," and none of Ward’s new mess-mates resided there when Quincy had. When Ward arrived, he "found the New Jersey gentlemen in possession," and Congressman David Dagget, the successor of Chauncy Goodrich, claimed "his birthright." Thus Ward and Daniel Webster, both from Massachusetts, "took what was left."138 Coyle’s house consisted of all Federalist members from the Seventh through the Fifteenth Congresses. During the Sixteenth Congress, John F. Parrott, a Republican Representative from New Hampshire, became the first non-Federalist in the mess, and during the following

Congress, Federalist membership in the mess dropped to two Representatives—Francis Baylies (MA) and Joseph Hemphill (PA). Thomas H. Hubbard, a Republican of New York, was aware of the regional background of his messmates as selected lodgings with "General Tallmadge of Poughkeepsie, a gentleman of distinguished merit and great moral worth," at Queen's Hotel on Capitol Hill during the Fifteenth Congress. He observed the presence of "a great number of New Englanders" in the mess.\textsuperscript{14}\\n\\nOnce settled into their residences, members established daily routines. Committees met on Saturdays, and members consumed their evening hours writing home, reading, and visiting other mess-mates. George Wolf, a Republican Representative from Pennsylvania, wrote his friend Colonel Thomas McKean of his pleasure in receiving mail. "You cannot imagine the difference in sentiments produced by the receipt of a letter from home," he wrote. Wolf spent much of his free-time buried in his room, with "dull dry reading or writing a response on some stale revolutionary claim."\textsuperscript{140} Representative James J. Despite their agendas, members still found time to entertain and be entertained by Washington society and the diversions of the growing city. Dinner parties and dances brought members from different messes together. Harrison Gray Otis frequently invited guests to dine with his mess. After dinner Otis and company went for a walk, then they took tea, after which Otis retired to his chambers where he wrote, meditated, and took care of other "little things." Otis always kept his wife and daughters abreast of the parties and social events he attended.\textsuperscript{142}

The Old genl, Mon. La Vapeur[?], Old Hickory, J[ohn] Q[uincy], [Henry] Clay, Mr. Hines, Genl. Smith & [John C.] Calhoun were our guests. Old Hickory was under par, and Adams with every aspiration to triumph over him, we jointly felt that he was not out of the woods. Clay was in fine spirits, and amused himself a little at the expense of the rivals--J&A sat next to each other. ... a vacant chair intervening; Clay was on the opposite side, and in the course of the evening, left his chair and occupied the vacant seat between Old Hickory and Adams, saying to A&J--'Well gentlemen since you are both too near the chair, but neither can occupy it, I will step in between you, & take it myself.'

Elizabeth and Levi Woodbury threw a dinner for twelve including among "those members with whom Mr. Woodbury had dined. . . the Vice President, the British Minister, & many others of distinction." Mrs. Woodbury characterized the dinner as "much beyond" normal boardinghouse fare. Particular care was given to the selection of the wines on which hung the dinner's reputation. Following dinner, the group adjourned to a party at the French minister's.

As Anne Royall noted, even in its early years Washington City had vices which tempted members of Congress.

I will venture to say, that no city of the same age has kept pace with [Washington] in vice and dissolute manners. And what is still more astonishing, is, that it should erect its empire in the very Capitol itself.

Gambling, on the other hand, was "a respectable pastime for gentlemen," and most parties included a room specially reserved for "this purpose," as "card playing for high stakes was usual among prominent politicians and men in office."\textsuperscript{148} British Secretary Augustus John Foster described cards as "a great resource of an evening," and gaming "all the fashion. . .for the men who frequented society were chiefly from Virginia and the western states and were very fond of this most gambling of all games as being one of countenance as well as cards. Loo was the innocent diversion of the ladies."\textsuperscript{149} Lemuel Sawyer and fellow boarder Thomas Law entered into a mutually beneficial gambling partnership. An excellent whist player, Law often joined Sawyer, Henry Clay, and others in a game.

His stakes never exceed one dollar, while that of the members generally were from 5 to $10 on the game. Had it not been for Mr. Law, my expenses would have exceeded my pay, and I should have been straightened for means to get home. I agreed with him to stake $5 or $10 on every game he played, I would risk the balance and what he lost over his stake, I would make good, and what he gained he should give me. That relieved him of the embarrassment which his low bets occasioned. Upon retiring early in the evening, I offered him on that occasion $20 as a fund to start with, but he refused to take it, saying he had enough to meet all his losses. The next morning after breakfast, he handed me thirty dollars as my share of the gains of his skill and good luck, and frequently afterwards, on his return from Whist parties, he would give me sums from 5 to $29, and not more than once or twice, had I to make good any trifling loss.150

News of congressional exploits spread to wives and friends through members' letters. Representative Louis McLane quipped to his wife Kitty that Henry Clay "might stake his country, as he stakes his fortune, on the turn of a card."151 Indeed, Clay returned to private practice during the Seventeenth Congress in order to pay his gambling debts.

Stakes were also high at the annual horse races. The races, which met four miles from Capitol Hill, brought spectators and competitors from the surrounding areas of Virginia and Maryland for the five-day spectacle. Samuel Latham Mitchill described the audience as including "the gentle and the simple," as well as "all the great folk including officers of government. . . a great number of ladies. . . [and] several of the reverend clergy."

Rosalie Stier Calvert, wife of planter George Calvert, attended the races with Mrs. Eliza Law. Mrs. Calvert described the races as "splendid," and remarked upon the presence of "a great number of carriages." The love of horses and racing seems to have been an acceptable diversion for members.

For some members the separation from family--from wives in particular--led to other, socially unacceptable vices. Lemuel Sawyer, whose associations with "a woman of bad fame" became a campaign issue, defeated his accuser, James Irdell, and returned to Washington determined to wed "the first decent girl" he could find. Another representative was not so fortunate. In 1820 gossip about

Representative Charles Pinckney's rendezvous with a "mulatto wench" in an "old tenantless house" was relayed to Sally Otis in a letter from her husband, Representative Harrison Gray Otis. A "butcher having been robbed," saw Pinckney as he "skulk[ed]" into the [vacant] house. A posse, which had formed to assist the butcher surrounded the house, thinking that Pinckney was the thief, and called for Pinckney to give himself up. Pinckney, however, jumped from a window, then fell, and was caught by the posse. Upon being recognized as a member of Congress, he was permitted to leave. The fact that the "pure citizens of Charleston" did not re-elect Pinckney suggests that knowledge of Pinckney's extra-marital affairs ended his political career.\textsuperscript{155}

Later that spring, a Miss Coolidge, "the daughter of a poor widow," was seduced by a boarder, and her brother, a West Point cadet, stabbed the culprit upon his refusal to marry the girl.\textsuperscript{156} By June of the same year, the women board-members of the Washington Orphan Asylum sarcastically suggested that since "the fathers of the nation had left for that great and moral body to found or establish a foundling institution and should certainly move that the additional dollars a day which they have given themselves as an increase of pay may be appropriated as a fund toward the support of the institution. 157

Although prolonged absences from home may have caused problems for some members, members of Congress--House and Senate--spent an average of five years in office. Keeping in mind that the constitutional age requirement of twenty-five for members of Congress, and thirty for Senators, and the fact that men lived on average only fifty-five years, five years represented one fifth of their productive, adult lives. For some members, the call to higher office came as an appointment to the Senate. Samuel Latham Mitchell wrote to his wife of his resignation from the House of Representatives:

On Friday, November 23, I resigned my seat in the House of Representatives. This I was enabled to do from having received from Albany my commission from the Legislature of New York to act as a Senator. Accordingly, I wrote a letter of resignation. . .which was read to the House. . . I feel no small regret on separating from a body of constituents who have so often given me proofs of their confidence. But it is not a total separation from them, for I still represent them in a body where my vote is greatly more ponderous; for while in the House of Representatives it was only one-seventeenth of the weight of the State, it is now, when shared with General Smith, my colleague, increased to one-half.\textsuperscript{158}

Other members accepted cabinet positions and, later, appointments to the Supreme Court.\textsuperscript{159} Most of these government officials identified with particular political parties.

Whether service represented a genuine desire to serve the republic, or a personal desire for power, an examination of the first three decades of the federal city reveals a certain level of consistency among office holders. Although it is beyond the scope of this study, a quantitative analysis of boardinghouse cohesion in relation to party loyalty and sectional alliances, may reveal significant insights into the workings of the first two party systems. Persistence in federal offices also led to consistency within Washington society. Members who remained in office interacted with Washington's permanent residents and were an important part of the developing community.\textsuperscript{160}

Washington City's boardinghouses and hotels provided members of Congress, diplomats, and visitors to the city with more than simply a place to sleep. For governmental officials, these houses and hotels acted as a place where political compatriots came together, a place where they freely discussed political issues and planned social events. Messes or eating groups provided members with an identity, and like a fraternity encouraged social and political action. Messes also brought together like-minded people from different regions. Residences as well as mess groups, during this period were far from static, and though people moved frequently, the friendships they formed continued beyond service in the Capitol City. Consciously created to reflect specific political and social sentiments, messes gained their importance from the men who organized them. Messes reflecting preformed political sentiments brought men from different states and regions together, and contributed to the fortification of political parties.

Just as the physical city changed from 1800 to 1830, so did the Washington political community. The physical and symbolic structures of government--the Capitol and the President's house—and ultimately the city itself, became a focal point of national attention. The political spectacle of American democracy fascinated both visitors and residents and as experience helped tune the mechanics of the political process, the federal government became an inseparable part of the Washington community.

Washington City offered many diversions for visitors and permanent residents alike. Just as the physical structure of this new city changed dramatically during its first thirty years, so did its social structure.

The legislators, cabinet officials, Supreme Court Justices, members of the diplomatic corps and their wives, who flocked into town for the winter social season organized parties, dances, teas, and assorted outings--some of which had political motives. "The new inhabitants who thronged to the seat of government," recalled Margaret Bayard Smith, "came from every quarter of the union, bringing with them the modes and customs of their respective states." The "novel" society formed by "this motley throng soon became united into one close and intimate circle, by a feeling common to all,--they were strangers in a strange land." Margaret Bayard Smith believed that "the necessity of mutual aid and accommodation" experienced by these new arrivals could be compared to a mosaic "in which an infinity of separate pieces of diversified colors, [were] blended into one harmonious whole." These strangers were part of the public, political drama of life in the capital city.

292 Levi Woodbury coined the term 'petticoat politicians' while discussing the Eaton imbroglio in a letter to his wife. Levi Woodbury to Elizabeth Clapp Woodbury, 11 February 1830, reel 4, Papers of Levi Woodbury.

Historian Barbara Carson suggests that "political status" and "wealth, education, and social bearing" determined who was entitled "a place within fashionable or genteel society." Carson found two elites at the top of Washington's social hierarchy, a political elite and the well-bred, well-educated, affluent elite. The idea of two separate elites in Washington may be somewhat misleading, since most politicians who played a role within Washington society were wealthy, well-educated, and genteel; the rougher, less refined politicians were not ordinarily welcome in polite society. Although Washington remained largely a city of transients, the political society came to life during sessions of Congress and the social season.

Congressional wives, most of whom only came for a part of the Congressional term, took accommodations either with their husbands in hotels or boardinghouses, or with friends in private houses. These elite women played active roles in Washington society and exhibited both a knowledge of and interest in politics and a surprising amount of autonomy for the time period.

As historian Nancy Cott recognized, the "work" of unmarried elite women "largely consisted of maintaining 166 The social season usually began in early winter and continued until early spring. Appendix B lists members of presidential cabinets and Supreme Court Justices. Most cabinet members and many Supreme Court Justices brought their wives with them to Washington. John Quincy and Louisa Adams spent eighteen years in Washington, as did James and Dolley Madison; James and Elizabeth Monroe resided in the city for fourteen years.

social contacts."¹⁶⁷ Maintaining such social contacts kept both the wives and unmarried daughters of Washington's politicians occupied. These wives and mothers came to Washington to be with their husbands and to take advantage of the social opportunities that the season provided. Those with daughters of a marriageable age sought suitors, thus making Washington, as British minister Augustus John Foster discovered, "one of the most marrying places of the whole continent."¹⁶⁸ As the center of national affairs, Washington drew people from all over the United States. The resulting inter-sectional marriages bound families from different states and formed bonds between the elites of different regions.¹⁶⁹

Thomas Jefferson's rule number 12, in The Cannons of Etiquette To Be Observed by the Executive, established that "the President and his family take precedence everywhere in public or private."¹⁷⁰ As early as the Jefferson administration, the President's family was to set the social precedents. The notion of the President’s family as arbiter of social etiquette, however, did not become an issue until the Monroe administration. During Jefferson’s administration, the widower President selected Dolley Madison, wife of then Secretary of State James Madison, to act as his hostess, possibly establishing the precedent that the Secretary of State’s wife would be considered the informal leader of the political society.\[171\]

Despite her humble origins as the daughter of a Virginia Quaker, Dolley Payne Todd Madison became one of Washington’s most celebrated hostesses. The Washington City Orphan Asylum elected Dolley as First Directress in 1815, a position which she held until 1817. At presidential dinners and levees her engaging personality and lack of pretensions set guests at ease. Dolley Madison enjoyed playing cards and dipping snuff, and she acted as a frequent chaperon for her sisters, nieces, and other young relatives when they visited the city. Although she did not dance, she frequented "assemblies" as the subscription balls were called.

The presidential election of 1812 found the Federalist press attacking Mrs. Madison; rumors circulated that she had had an affair with Thomas Jefferson while the Madisons 171 Presidential hostesses considered in this work are limited to Dolley Madison, Elizabeth Monroe, and Louisa Catherine Adams. Abigail Adams’ brief residence in Washington had little impact on Washington’s social development.

resided with him prior to the purchase of their F Street house. The Boston Federalist even alleged that James Madison pimped both Mrs. Madison and her younger sister Anna Cutts, wife of Congressman Richard Cutts (R, ME), in order to secure the support of the Democrats and foreign governments. Later Charles Pinckney, an unsuccessful candidate for the Presidency, remarked that he "was beaten by Mr. and Mrs. Madison" and that he "might have had a better chance had [he] faced Mr. Madison alone." 172

A good friend of Mrs. Madison recalled that Dolley "never forgot a name she had once heard, nor a face she had once seen, nor the personal circumstance connected with every individual of her acquaintance." 173 Thus the quiet, reserved public demeanor of the sage of Montpelier was offset by his wife's grace and ease in society and as historian Betty Boyd Caroli noted "the weakness of one partner could be offset by the strengths of the other." 174

President Madison recognized his wife's assets and employed her social skills to defuse potentially volatile political situations. Following his removal as Secretary of State, Robert Smith refused to attend a presidential dinner with the Madisons. A few days later Mrs. Madison and her sisters, Lucy Payne Washington and Anna Cutts "called twice" upon the former Secretary with, as Smith wrote, "professions of great affection." Dolley Madison responded to the Federalists' boycott of the President's invitations during the election of 1812 by entertaining so many Republicans over two successive nights that the Federalists resumed their calling in order to diminish the display of Republican solidarity. Dolley Madison further assisted her husband's political prospects by visiting "all the Congressman's families who moved to Washington," a physically daunting act which one historian suggests "signaled humility in the president's attitude toward legislators."

Elizabeth Monroe was not nearly so active, James Monroe's ascension to the Presidency brought a significant change in Washington's social climate. Mrs. Monroe did not pay visits, due to ill health, and despite a residence of six years in Washington at the time of Monroe's election, they remained strangers to "all the citizens" according to Margaret Bayard Smith.

177 Margaret Bayard Smith to Jane Kirkpatrick, 23 November 1817, in Gaillard Hunt, ed., The First Forty Years, 141. As first lady Elizabeth Monroe spent a great deal of time visiting her married daughters and other relatives in her home state of New York.
When Mrs. Monroe was elected First Directress of the Washington City Orphan Asylum in 1817, she declined the office. One consequence of Mrs. Monroe's refusal to call upon congressional wives and her aloofness from society was a boycott of her parties by some members of Washington's elite. Elizabeth Monroe attempted to limit her public role and to separate her public and private lives. When her youngest daughter Maria married, only close family friends were invited. During her husband's second presidential term Elizabeth spent months visiting her daughters.

Louisa Catherine Johnson Adams holds the distinction of being the only foreign born President's wife. The young Mrs. Adams had been born in London and schooled in France. Louisa Adams first viewed the United States at the age of twenty-six after John Quincy Adams had finished his service in Berlin. Louisa Adams was once "closely questioned" about her Sunday evening visitors by a woman who thought she may have been entertaining "improper persons." Louisa Adams recoiled at the "attempt to introduce distinctions" or to "close" society. Ironically in 1820, she was the "reputed author" of newly coined distinctions, a practice which would have excluded her own family as they ranked "among the inadmissible" on the purportedly "new social scale."^\textsuperscript{180}

A controversy over the etiquette of making first calls arose in 1819, and Secretary of State Adams wrote to the Louisa Catherine Adams Journal, 1 February 1820, reel 265, Louisa Adams Papers. Louisa’s father Joshua Johnson, a merchant from Annapolis, Maryland, went to London in 1783, as an agent and partner of Wallace, Davidson and Johnson. In London, he met and married Catherine Nuth. During the Revolution, Johnson moved his family to France, where Louisa gained most of her education. After the Revolution, they returned to London where Joshua served as the first American Consul. In London John Quincy Adams met and married Louisa. Due to business difficulties, Joshua did not provide Louisa with a dowry, a fact which greatly disturbed Abigail Adams. The Johnsons returned to the United States in 1800, and took up residence in Washington, where President John Adams appointed Joshua Superintendent of Stamps. When the Senate tied over Joshua’s confirmation, Vice President Thomas Jefferson cast the deciding vote in Johnson’s favor. Under Jefferson’s first administration, however, the post was abolished. In Washington, the Johnsons lived near the Thorntons, and Mrs. Thornton often visited the Johnsons and their extended family.

All of the Johnson children made respectable matches. Carolina Marylandia Johnson first married Baltimore merchant Andrew Buchanan, and following Buchanan’s death, she married Nathaniel Frye. Another sister, Eleanor, married Senator John Pope from Kentucky in 1810, but died in childbirth. Catherine Johnson married Abigail Adams’ nephew William Steuben Smith in 1813. In 1814 Adelaide Johnson married Walter Hellen, the widower of her sister Nancy Johnson. Harriet Johnson married George Boyd, of the Pension Office. When Carolina Johnson Buchanan Frye’s husband was jailed for debts during John Quincy Adams’ presidency, both Louisa and the President visited the incarcerated Mr. Frye. Louisa’s foreign background and her outspokenness disturbed some women.
Vice-President to clarify the situation. Adams recognized the custom of members of the executive branch making first calls to members of the Senate. Nevertheless, he believed that government existed for the business of government and opted not to make first calls, as "no ceremonial...or order of interchanging visits between the persons belonging to the respective departments...had ever been established." Adams described in detail his experiences as Senator in relation to the issue of first calls, stressing the absence of a written etiquette. He also explained that Mrs. Adams, with his "approbation and advice, ...acted upon the same principle with regard to the ladies connected with members of the senate or house of representatives."

As wife of the Secretary of State, Mrs. Adams did not normally make first calls to strangers. But she "received with pleasure, and returned, the visits of all ladies who have called upon her, whether connected with members of congress or otherwise." Mrs. Adams visited her friends as a private citizen, "without pretensions to claim, and without being sensible of any obligations to pay, any first visit." Adams continued by noting that as wife of a Senator, Mrs. Adams did make first calls on the wives of heads of departments, but "lays no claim to the same attention. . . having no pretensions to visits of etiquette herself, [she] thinks herself amenable to none from others." Indeed, Louisa Adams was not fond of formalities and often preferred reading at home to making calls or attending balls."

Like Dolley Madison, Louisa Adams was a popular hostess, as well as a target for election year mud-slinging. During the election of 1828 the anti-Adams press questioned Louisa Adams' loyalty to the United States, accused her of being illegitimate, and claimed that she and John Quincy Adams lived had slept together prior to their marriage. Andrew Jackson ordered such rumors stopped as they were intended to hurt the reputation of a lady."

The business of making calls--or of seeing and being seen--followed socially prescribed rules. One visitor noted, "the more a stranger at Washington can ascertain and know before-hand of the customs and etiquette of society, and the forms of doing public business, the better prepared he will be to enjoy society and to advance his individual interest."[187] The same lesson applied to female visitors. The making and taking of social calls was both time consuming and arduous. Louisa Adams described such visits as "the torments of [her] life."[188] As the wife of a presidential hopeful, Mrs. Adams's responsibilities included making first calls to the wives of members of Congress.

It is understood that a man who is ambitious to become President of the United States, must make his wife visit the Ladies of the Members of Congress first; otherwise, he is totally inefficient to fill so high an office. You would laugh could you see Mr. A. every morning prepare a set of cards with as much formality as if he was drawing up some very important articles, to negotiate in a Commercial Treaty.[189]

She once spent two hours stopping at between eight and ten boardinghouses searching for two ladies who had called on her, and described herself as "fretted and fatigued to death and almost unfitted by [her] anxiety to return the civilities shown [her]." A day later she found where they lived but the ladies were not at home, and so she left them "cards of invitation."[190] Louisa did as expected but in her journal, the extremely frank Mrs. Adams wrote, "Oh! these visits they have made me sick many times, and I really sometimes think they will make me crazy."\textsuperscript{191}

Few congressional wives actually set up house-keeping in Washington. Arriving as they did primarily for the social season, most of these women left their young children at home with relatives or servants. With the exception of planning occasional dinners for their husbands' associates, these women had few domestic concerns--servants, slaves, and shopkeepers provided any goods or services they required. Elizabeth Clapp Woodbury organized such a dinner for her husband and his messmates. From a grocer, she procured "old Madeira. . . Old Brandy, Old Sherry, Old Port, Old Claret, 'Sparkling' Champaign, Porter & Cider" and despite Representative John Randolph's absence, the dinner went well.\textsuperscript{192}

Socializing was the principle business of these political wives.\textsuperscript{193} Morning calls began around noon and continued until three o'clock. Depending upon the weather and the number of calls a lady had to make, she either walked or rode in her carriage. Upon arrival at her destination, either the lady or her footman rang the door bell, and inquired whether or not the lady of the house was in. If the lady was receiving company, servants ushered guests into the parlor, if she was out, or not receiving visitors, visitors simply left calling cards. Those callers who did not care to meet with a specific party, but who were nevertheless required by etiquette to pay a visit to that party, simply sent a footman to the door with a calling card.194

Deviations from established etiquette were at times warranted in this political epicenter. At times, those familiar with the society at Washington City helped their friends avoid embarrassing faux pas through notes which invited a newly arrived to pay a call. When William and Sarah Seaton arrived in Washington, Mrs. Seaton was not familiar with the custom of making first calls. Thus Hannah Gallatin, wife of Albert Gallatin, sent Mrs. Seaton

194 See E. Cooley, A Description of Etiquette, 37-39. Calling cards resemble business cards of today. Cooley describes the cards as "about three inches long, and two broad," "generally white, some with gilt edges, others not." Names were either printed by copperplate, or inscribed by hand," 35. See John F. Kasson's Rudeness & Civility: Manners in Nineteenth-Century Urban America (New York: Hill and Wang, 1990), 173-74, for an analysis of calling etiquette. a note to inform her that she would "wait on"—entertain a call from—Mrs. Seaton, as soon as Mrs. Seaton settled into her house.\textsuperscript{195}

Louisa Adams also showed her willingness to deviate from the established customs when she received a call from the wife of Representative Nathaniel Beverly Tucker of Virginia, a lady to whom Mrs. Adams had never been introduced. Mrs. Tucker "had come to pay... a visit," recorded Mrs. Adams, "tho' she did not owe it." Mrs. Adams continued, "she had liked my countenance and manners and was determined to be acquainted with me in spite of etiquette."\textsuperscript{196} An earlier controversy over calling arose when the hero of New Orleans, Andrew Jackson, and his wife Rachel visited Washington. The ladies of Washington were unsure if they would call upon Mrs. Jackson. Eventually, they did call upon the hero's wife, and although she was "a totally uninformed woman in mind and manners," she was "extremely civil."\textsuperscript{197}

Many social calls resulted in the issuance of invitations for private social events. Social occasions drew people from all over Washington. With husbands in tow, the wives of Congressmen, Senators, cabinet officials, foreign ministers, and even the President flocked to social events during the season—"for the express purpose," as Catharine Akerly Mitchell wrote, "of seeing and being seen." Social engagements consisted of select balls, private dinners, intimate teas, and public presidential levees. Attending the theater, horse races, and visiting the congressional galleries also proved amusing to Washington's elites. All of these popular entertainments attracted members and wives of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of government, as well as diplomats, journalists and other members of the elite community.

Presidential dinners, intimate teas, and formal balls, ordinarily by invitation only, afforded specific groups the opportunity for social intercourse. In these private assemblies the elite came together, away from the public. Presidential dinners allowed members of the elite to socialize in greater privacy and on a more intimate level than did levees or balls.

During Jefferson's and Madison's administrations, presidential dinners included cabinet officials, members of Congress, diplomats, and their wives. Margaret Bayard Smith and her husband, Samuel Harrison Smith, dined frequently with President Jefferson. By seldom inviting more than twelve guests, Jefferson avoided "all form," and such intimacy encouraged "general and unreserved" conversation. After dinner the ladies retired to the drawing-room and the men presumably discussed politics. Catharine Mitchell related to her sister the consequences of an invitation to dine with President and Mrs. Madison:

Two days after our arrival at the seat of government, before I had called on Mrs. M. or even seen her, we received an invitation to dine at the Palace on the following Saturday. It is understood that Mrs. Madison is to receive the first visit, and this is usually made in the morning, but if you make your appearance at the drawing room I believe she accepts it as a substitute. Now as I had not called on her in the morning, I thought it proper and respectful to attend the drawing room, before I dined with her.

The William Seatons also dined with the Madisons. Sarah Seaton recalled that at the "palace" one evening were the Treasurer of the United States; British Minister Russell; Representatives Richard Cutts (R,ME), George Poindexter (Del. MS), William R. King (R,NC), General John Smith (Rs,NY) and daughter, Colonel Peterson Goodwyn (R,VA) and daughter; John and Marcia Van Ness; Patrick and Martha Goodwyn Magruder; Mr. Edward Coles; Washington Irving; an European visitor; Payne Todd, Mrs. Madison, and "his Highness." The guests chatted "sans ceremonie" until dinner was called. After a "very fine dinner" the ladies left the table and amused themselves with the piano, while the gentlemen drank a "social glass." Half an hour later, the gentlemen joined the ladies in the tea room. Mrs. Gales, Miss Smith, and Mrs. Madison discussed "books, men and manners, literature in general, and many special branches of knowledge."²⁰⁰

By December of 1820, Mrs. Monroe had abolished the practice of inviting wives to presidential dinners.²⁰¹ Louisa Adams initiated the practice of excluding wives while Adams was Secretary of State because of the limited salaries of cabinet secretaries and the size of rooms in her house. She observed that all the secretaries' wives "thought proper to follow this example as they found it convenient, and the President's family have this winter condescended to adopt my practice surely forgetting the difference between a Salary of 2500 and six thousand dollars a year."²⁰²

By excluding the wives Elizabeth Monroe saved herself from hostessing responsibilities. Without a hostess, President Monroe invited no ladies to his dinners, and consequently the wives and daughters of his guests were left at home. President Monroe's dinners, unlike the jovial gatherings of Presidents Jefferson and Madison, were punctuated with "long silences and early departures." Nevertheless Monroe returned for a second term.

Evening tea customarily was taken at nine o'clock. Visits to private families without ceremony yielded coffee, tea and crackers, or bread. Invitations to tea resulted in better fare, normally consisting of sweet-cakes, macaroons, and the like with the tea and coffee. Catharine Akerly Mitchell described one such tea to her sister.

It is fashionable here to give large tea and card parties; and the Ladies on these occasions dress much more gay and splendid then they do in N'York. On Thursday I went to Mrs. Madison's according to appointment, to take tea. I found there a crowd of people of both sexes. The females were seated round the room gaily attired & making a brilliant appearance. The Gentlemen were standing up walking about... As soon as tea was over the card tables were introduced and those who were fond of gambling gathered around.

At both public events and exclusive social gatherings, ladies and gentlemen mixed freely. Although gentlemen could attend events without escorts, convention required ladies to be escorted—two ladies however, could be escorted by one gentleman. After greeting the host and hostess, guests moved from room to room and partook of refreshments and amusements as they wished.

Levees or drawing rooms provided citizens and visitors to Washington the opportunity of meeting the President and his wife. Although the practice of these open-houses changed with each administration, they ordinarily were held once a "forte-night," often on Thursdays. Representative Duncan McArthur (ACR, OH) did not favor the Washington social scene. He described levees as so crowded that "it was with great difficulty that a person could turn themselves around."209

House parties were also crowded. The Seatons were among the few private citizens who entertained General Lafayette in their home during his 1824 visit to Washington. For the event, Sarah Seaton had to rearrange her house.

My chambers and the large nursery were deranged and arranged for the occasions, serving as card and supper rooms. We danced in the dining and drawing rooms, the latter opened for the first time, and thus pleasantly inaugurated.\textsuperscript{210}

For ladies long familiar with the whirl of Washington, the social season could become tedious. In a letter to her close friends Ambassador Joel and Ruth Barlow, Dolly Madison described levees as so crowded that they had become "oppressive."\textsuperscript{211} Like Mrs. Adams and Mrs. Madison, Mrs. Mitchell also, recognized the potential tedium of these gatherings:

\begin{quote}
There is a great sameness [in] these parties. You see almost the same faces, with few exceptions and the same things are acted over again; so that I should very soon get tired of them.\textsuperscript{212}
\end{quote}

Nevertheless, as the wives of political notables, these women had a duty to keep up appearances.

Appearances made an impact in Washington and Cooley found that following a levee, "fine dress and beauty furnish the theme of conversation for the following day." At levees and parties, he added, "there are as great beauties, and more splendour of dress. . .than in any other place in the United States." Albeit Cooley reports the lack of a formal dress code, he marks the presence of "the most distinguished and fashionable people in the United States" at Washington City. Fashionable dresses were noted. In fact, the dress of some ladies caused quite a stir—especially the Parisian-style dresses of Madame Jerome Bonaparte, the former Miss Elizabeth "Betsy" Patterson of Baltimore. As early as 1804, Rosalie Stier Calvert, wife of George Calvert, described fashionable party clothing as "extremely becoming" although some display a little too much—among other, Madame Bonaparte who wears dresses so transparent and tight that you can see her skin through them, no chemise at all."

Catharine Mitchill offered a similar description of "the pretty little Duchess of Baltimore," two years later. She outshines all the Ladies here for the splendour and elegance of her dress; even Mrs.

214 Betsy Patterson created a stir in American society when she married Napoleon Bonaparte's younger brother Jerome. As the daughter of wealthy Baltimore businessman William Patterson, the young belle had her choice of suitors. Napoleon refused to recognize the marriage and had it annulled according to a French technicality which forbade marriage by individuals under the age of twenty-five without family consent. The annulment occurred several years after the birth of their son Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte. Jerome, Sr. married princess Katherine, and was crowned king of Westphalia. Betsy never remarried, and spent several years in Europe trying to get royal recognition for Jerome, Jr., but ultimately, Jerome considered himself American.

M[adison] cannot sport Diamonds and pearls in such profusion. The evening I saw her, she was dressed very plain, at least that part of her body that was covered at all. She exposes so much of her bosom as modesty would permit, & I think rather more. Her back was laid bare nearly half way down to the bottom of her waist; and although she display'd a very white, smooth neck, she might have used artificial means to make it so. The state of nudity in which she appeared attracted the attention of the Gentlemen, for I saw several of them take a look at her bubbies while they were conversing with her.216

Margaret Bayard Smith also found Madame Bonaparte's attire, or lack thereof, shocking. "Mobs of boys have crowded round her splendid equipage to see what I hope will not be often seen in the country, an almost naked woman." Mrs. Smith then wrote of "an elegant and select party," given by Mrs. Robert Smith, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, where "a crowd assembled round the windows to get a look at this beautiful little creature."

Madame Bonaparte's dress was the thinnest sarcent and white crepe without the least stiffening in it, made without a single plait in the skirt, the width of the bottom being made of gores; there was scarcely any waist to it and no sleeves; her back, her bosom, part of her waist and her arms were uncover'd and the rest of her form visible.217

Rosalie Calvert, who also attended the Smith's gathering, described the dress as "so transparent that you could see the color and shape of her thighs, and even more!"

Madame Bonaparte's dress provided Thomas Law with the inspiration for a poem:

I was at Mrs. Smith's last night
And highly gratified my self
Well! what of Madame Bonaparte
Why she's a little whore at heart
Her lustful looks her wanton air
Her limbs revealed her bosom bare...
Show her ill suited for life
Of a Columbians modest wife
Wisely she's chosen her proper line,
She's formed for Jerom's concubine."

The following evening, Madame Bonaparte was to attend a gathering at French Minister Pinchon's. Mrs. Robert Smith and some other ladies informed Madame Bonaparte that "if she wished to meet them there, she must promise to have more clothes on."219

To make calls or attend balls, ladies had to be properly attired. Most women varied their costumes by adding to or changing the trimmings on their gowns and bonnets. Ladies such as Anna Thornton, Mrs. Henry Clay, Mary Boardman Crowninshield, wife of Benjamin Crowninshield, and Rosalie Stier Calvert depended on friends and relatives to send them trimmings. When Dolley Madison visited Philadelphia, she instructed her husband to tell Anna Thornton that she was "having the model of a bonnet made for her" as the new ones had just begun to arrive.

Mrs. Clay asked her sister Susan, wife of former Senator James Brown of Louisiana--then American Minister to Paris, France--to procure goods, and Mary Crowninshield wrote her relatives for yard goods and trimmings. Mrs. Crowninshield also sent models of fashionable apparel to her family so they could be in vogue as well. Rosalie Calvert employed her sister Isabelle Stier van Havre to outfit her daughter Caroline and herself for the social season. For herself, Rosalie requested: a hat for making morning calls, three or four pairs of shoes, a dress and bonnet or turban for an evening at the president's, a morning gown, a chemisette, and two bouquets of flowers. For Caroline, Rosalie asked: a winter hat, six pairs of shoes, an outfit for court--the President's--a dancing dress, a morning dress, two or three floral

Susan and Mary Lee, two of Washington's grandest belles and the daughters of William Lee, Auditor of the Treasury and former Consul to Bordeaux, France, decided that Benjamin Crowninshield's daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, "could not belong to the first families" because they wore "both flowers and feathers" in their satin bonnets, an indication of "very bad taste and style."\textsuperscript{223} Paradoxically, William Lee was an extravagant spendthrift, and according to Louisa Adams, he owed large debts to most of his acquaintances. Nevertheless, she found the Lee daughters "lovely," "well educated and highly accomplished."\textsuperscript{224}

E. Cooley advised visitors to Washington to purchase clothing for the winter season upon their arrival. He believed that some goods, at least by 1829, could be purchased "on as good, and many articles on better terms, than any other place in the United States." He also cited the presence of "first rate mantua-makers in Washington, direct from Paris and London." An 1811 report that a Georgetown milliner and mantua maker, Miss Dargin, had received some new bonnets from Baltimore drew a throng of ladies from "the President's lady down to a clerk's wife," according to Catharine Akerly Mitchell. She added that "a number of wives who visit this city, come from small towns or villages, where they cannot procure the most fashionable goods. They therefore have to supply themselves with such things as they want, after they get here." A humorous and lyrical view of the city, The Fudge Family in Washington, published anonymously in 1820, suggests the contrary.

Mantua-makers and mill'ners, I the Navy, astonished Representative Job Durfee (R,RI) and elicited a description of the scene to his wife.

I never was more surprized than at the dress of the females--both comfort, and I might add decency (according to my idea of it), were set at defiance--They resembled so many actresses with their bosom and backs half bare--I told Dr. Wolf who happened to be there that if some old Indian chief did rise from his grave on the banks of the Potomack he might think that things had changed appearance here with the exception of the dress of the females.228

Two years later another Representative, Duncan McArthur (ACR,OH), also found the dress of women at these social events scandalous. "The fashionable manner of dressing," he wrote, is to go half naked--The neck breasts and shoulder blades bare, and the dresses so constructed as to enable a person who is near and above them to see more than half way down the back or front of the lady, from the upper part of her dress. . . . This city would be the last place that I could wish to see a wife, a daughter, or female relation. Not but what I believe there are many virtuous, good and worthy women here--and what of such, are composed, a large majority of those who attend the fashionable parties. But I cannot but think, their manner of dressing or rather of going naked, and of crowding together improper. It is to me truly disgusting.229

By 1824 the leaders of Washington society had grown accustomed to the fashions that Betsy Bonaparte had introduced a decade earlier. While proper clothing remained important to the socially conscious, adhering to the established etiquette may have been more significant. After all fine clothing could be purchased but gaining admittance into the homes of the elite was an entirely different matter.

Notwithstanding Louisa Adams' claims that no social ranks existed, Washington's elite did not normally socialize with people of the working class. Education alone would not open society's doors. While little information could be located concerning women who worked in Washington, some information concerning the daughters of boardinghouse proprietors suggests that despite their education and knowledge of humanity, these women would not be admitted into the ranks of the social elite. Cooley describes these daughters as "quite respectable" and "good scholars"; he found "they kn[e]w more of human nature than any other class in Washington, or perhaps the United States," since "their homes have been the best schools to acquire a knowledge of human nature, of politeness, and fashion, that they could be at." As the gathering place 230 Ironically, Dolley Madison's widowed mother "received into her house some Gentlemen as boarders" in Philadelphia. Congressman Aaron Burr, one of Mrs. Payne's boarders, eventually introduced James Madison to the widow Dolley Payne Todd. See Dolley Madison to Margaret Bayard Smith, 31 August 1834, in Gaillard Hunt, ed., First Forty Years, 352, Betty Boyd Caroli, First Ladies, 13, and Carl Sferrazza Anthony, First Ladies, 54.

for people of money and power, boardinghouses made these women privy to the intrigues of the federal government. Cooley also found these women better educated than the "daughters of any business" and surely more politically aware than many other women. 231

Anna King, daughter of boardinghouse proprietor William King was as suggested previously, admired by her father’s boarders. Two other daughters of boardinghouse-keepers were Camilla Wurtz Sawyer and Margaret O’Neale Eaton, both of whom married members of Congress, but who nevertheless were found objectionable by elite society. Lemuel Sawyer’s reputation for philandering, coupled with his marriage to a girl of fifteen, did not endear him to the leaders of elite society. Margaret O’Neale Timberlake, the infamous "Peggy Eaton," is said to have destroyed Andrew Jackson’s cabinet in her quest to be admitted into elite society.

The story of the Eaton imbroglio demonstrates that simply marrying well did not ensure acceptance into polite society. Margaret Eaton (she claimed in her 1878 autobiography that no one ever called her Peggy) was the daughter of William O’Neale, a tavern and boardinghouse keeper. The O’Neale’s Franklin House boarded notables such as De Witt Clinton, Madame Elizabeth Patterson Bonapartee, Andrew Jackson, and of course Senator John Henry Eaton.

231 E. Cooley, A Description of Etiquette, 71-72.
William O'Neale introduced "the men in the public house who were fit associates," to his family; in this way, Margaret and her siblings "became acquainted with all the distinguished men in the nation."

Thus, from her earliest years Margaret O'Neale encountered men of power and privilege.

Representative William T. Barry of Virginia, who resided at O'Neale's boardinghouse in 1815, mentioned Margaret in a letter to his wife:

I should not forget to name amongst others [in the house] a charming little girl, the daughter of Mr. O'Neal[e]...who very frequently plays on the Piano, and entertains us with agreeable songs, and amongst others some that touch my heart because they were tunes I have heard my dearest Catharine play so often.\(^\text{233}\)

The very animated Margaret was prized for her wit and charm and once claimed a dancing prize awarded by Dolley Madison. Margaret was also a headstrong girl and, following an attempted elopement, William O'Neale sent her to a New York seminary under the care of Governor De Witt Clinton. After a few months Margaret convinced her father that she would behave, and she was permitted to return to Washington. A few years later, she married. Margaret's first husband, John Timberlake, was a purser in the navy who died while on a voyage. Popular accounts depicted Timberlake's death as a suicide inspired by his knowledge of his wife's rumored extra-marital affairs. Rumors surrounding Timberlake's death plagued Margaret for years. Timberlake and Senator John Eaton had been friends, and following Timberlake's death, Eaton promised to care for Margaret and her three children. Just under a year after Timberlake's death and prior to the conclusion of the traditional mourning period, John Henry Eaton married Margaret O'Neale Timberlake.

It is possible that youthful indiscretions—an attempted elopement and omnipresent outspokenness—drew unwelcome attention to Margaret and cast a shadow on her reputation. Consequently when members of Washington's elite families were asked to attend the wedding, they "declare[d] they will not go to the wedding, and if they can help it will not let their husband's go. . ." Thus began the ladies' war.

As a Senator's wife and an avowed favorite of General Jackson, Mrs. Eaton expected to be welcomed into polite society. However, rumors that the former Mrs. Timberlake had not been a chaste widow plagued the new Mrs. Eaton and her groom. Indeed, Margaret Bayard Smith intimated that Margaret Eaton's reputation, and her "previous connection with [Eaton] both before and after her husband’s death," had destroyed the Senator’s reputation. Mrs. Smith also noted, she has never been admitted into good society, is very handsome and not of an inspiring character and violent temper. She is, it is said, irresistible and carries whatever point she sets her mind on. The General's personal and political friends are very much disturbed about it; his enemies laugh and divert themselves with the idea of what a suitable lady in waiting Mrs. Eaton will make to Mrs. Jackson.

Emily Donelson, Andrew Jackson's official hostess, expressed sentiments similar to Mrs. Smith's, which Martin Van Buren recorded in his autobiography. Mrs. Donelson characterized Mrs. Eaton as bad tempered and of a "meddlesome disposition" the latter of which "had been so much increased by her husband’s elevation as to make her society too disagreeable to be endured."

News of the ladies' war spread through letters. William Barry, who first knew Margaret O’Neale as a youth, found Margaret, the woman, harmless, and he championed her cause in letters to his family.

I find that slander has gone abroad against the amiable lady of this gentleman [Eaton]. I was not acquainted with her until I came to the city. She appears to be an artless, sincere and friendly woman. She may have been imprudent, as most of the ladies here are, but I cannot believe she was ever criminal. Major Eaton is himself one of the most estimable gentlemen I ever saw; he is the confidential friend of the President, and has quite as much, rather more, weight with him than any other member of the Cabinet. The truth is there is an aristocracy here, as there is in all places, claiming preference for birth or wealth, and demanding obeisance from others; they allow none but sycophants who cringe to them to have standing or character. Mrs. Eaton was the daughter of a tavern-keeper belonging to the democracy: she has by good fortune (if it may be so considered) moved into the fashionable world. This has touched the pride of the self-constituted great, awakened the jealousy of the malignant and envious, and led to the basest calumny. You must receive with caution what comes through the family of Jude [McLane?]. He wants to be Secretary of War; Eaton was preferred to him, and he is a disappointed man.218

Ultimately, the question of Mrs. Eaton’s respectability factionalized polite society. The wives of Jackson’s cabinet members, Mesdames Ingham, Branch, Calhoun, and Macomb refused to attend events with Mrs. Eaton.219 In response to family inquiries, Margaret Bayard Smith wrote Mrs. Maria Bayard Boyd, of the conflict:

Public opinion, ever just & impartial--seems to have triumphed over personal feelings and intrigues & finally, doomed her to continue in her pristine & lowly condition.--A stand--a noble stand, I may say, since it is a stand taken against fever and favoritism--has been made by the ladies of Washington--& not even the President's wishes in favor of his dearest personal friend, can influence him to violate the respect due to virtue--by visiting one who has left her strait and narrow path--with the exception of two or three timid & rather insignificant personages who trembled for their husband's offices--not a lady has visited her. . . .

As the ladies' war raged on, Senators and Congressmen also chronicled Mrs. Eaton's appearances to their wives. Levi Woodbury noted her appearance at President Jackson's first levee.

As to Mrs. Eaton she was there--but the entire length of the room intervened between her & Mrs. Donelson--and the shyness of most of the company towards her almost excited sympathy--it produced in both her and Eaton such manifest depression-Whether she be injured or not by public rumor I could not decide--but very few ladies here keep up any intercourse at her house--the gentlemen are more liberal in their devotions at the footstool of power.

Later in the same month Woodbury recorded Margaret Eaton's presence in the Capitol on two successive days, noting comments to the effect that the Eaton affair would result in "an explosion," "a change in the cabinet" or nothing.

A few weeks later, according to Woodbury, Mrs. Eaton remained "the great topic of public conversation," and "a duel between two young officers"--resulting only in "some slight flesh wounds"—had been fought over questions of her honor. Subsequently, Woodbury wrote that he had "a thousand things to say [about secretaryships and the Eatons] and the queer influence of petticoat politicians in this mighty city," but apparently he did not commit them to writing. Woodbury did, however, relay the news that Mrs. Donelson was considering returning to Tennessee because of her frustration with the vice-president, Martin Van Buren. Van Buren hoped to supplant John C. Calhoun in Jackson's esteem "by warmly espousing the cause of Mrs. Eaton," according to Benjamin Ogle Tayloe. Tayloe believed that the General hoped to make Mrs. Eaton the head of Washington society. Tayloe recalled that Mrs. Calhoun and Mrs. McLane only left cards for Mrs. Eaton, an act which suggested that they would not extend private invitations to her. He described Martin Van Buren and James Buchanan as two of Mrs. Eaton's strongest supporters—allies who aided her in social situations. Indeed, "Mr. Van Buren made an attempt, though an unsuccessful one, to give her the support of the diplomatic corps" when "a grand ball was given by the Russian Minister, Baron Krudener." At the ball Van Buren chose to offer Mrs. Eaton his hand to accompany her to the dinner table. Mr. Eaton, the Secretary of War, was to escort Madame Huygens, wife of the Minister from the Netherlands, but she declined the honor, feigning "no appetite."

"On another occasion, when Mrs. Eaton tendered her hand," Madame Huygens kept her hand in her apron, "a fashionable article of dress, and a convenient one for Madame Huygens." It was these "rebuffs" and "bickerings" which "broke up the Cabinet." 245

Attempting to settle the controversy over his marriage, John Henry Eaton published A Candid Appeal to the American People in 1831. In this pamphlet, Eaton recalled that upon their return to Washington--from a honeymoon trip to Philadelphia--the Eatons found calling-cards from Mr. and Mrs. John C. Calhoun. The Eatons returned the Calhouns' call and were admitted to visit Mrs. Calhoun. The calls were not repeated. In the pamphlet, Eaton asked time and again why, if Calhoun and his colleagues hoped to remove him, did they impinge the honor of a mother of innocent children. Perhaps the most interesting insight into Mrs. Eaton's personality comes from a letter written by a servant of Mrs. Eaton's, Francis Hillery, to his former mistress Kitty McLane, wife of Louis McLane.

I am very sorry to tell you madame, but I am not at all pleased with Mrs. Eaton. She is the most complete piece of deception, that ever god made, and as a mistress, it would be cruelty to put a dumb brute, under her command. So you may judge—Madame how it goes with me! After having been raised under your kind protection believe me madame that never until now, have I truly learned the difference between freedom, and abject slavery, which I have voluntarily given up the sweets of one for the bitter sorrows of the other, but if it should please the divine providence, next March I shall free myself if possible from her iron grasp of vulgar insults. . . . Genl. Eaton is a gentleman and in my opinion, deserves a far more amiable companion than he has. I know madame, he wishes himself back in Tennessee and I sincerely wish that I was forever a child in your home. . . .

Admission into the elite circles of Washington society depended not only upon a person’s vocation or breeding, it also depended upon personality. Whereas Dolley Madison, whose mother ran a boardinghouse in Philadelphia, became one of Washington’s most admired hostesses, Margaret Eaton’s personality made her one of Washington’s most infamous ladies. What began as a question of etiquette, became a hotly debated political issue, an issue which clearly demonstrates how social issues and matters of 247 The tale of Margaret Eaton did not end happily. Following Eaton’s death, and the death of her daughters, Margaret raised her three grandchildren. Margaret inherited a good bit of money from Eaton and was comfortable, until she fell in love with her grandchildren’s dancing master, a man significantly younger than she. After taking a considerable amount of money from Margaret, her husband eloped with her eldest granddaughter.

etiquette affected national politics. The question of Mrs. Eaton's honor remains a topic of historical debate.

Another daughter of a boardinghouse-keeper who also married a member of Congress was Camilla Wurtz Sawyer. Like Margaret Eaton, Camilla Sawyer was found objectionable by polite society. Louisa Adams recorded the Sawyer marriage in her diary:

>a Member of Congress was married last Sunday to a young woman of fifteen whose father kept a public house in Georgetown--It is said she was engaged to a respectable mechanic but the charm of the member won the prize--His character is at its lowest ebb--*24

Implicit within Louisa Adams' entry is the idea that Lemuel Sawyer's dubious integrity sullied his wife's reputation. Certainly his reputation suffered from public knowledge of certain moral indiscretions following the death of his first wife, Mary Snowden Sawyer, in 1811. When news of his affairs became a campaign issue, Sawyer "decided to marry the first decent girl" he met. Three days after meeting Camilla Wurtz, he married her. In Camilla Sawyer's case, her youth and her husband's reputation may have precluded her admission into polite society."

The House of Representatives served as an arena for entertainment as well as a meeting place for public and politicians alike. The debates of Congress interested most visitors to Washington and served as a public arena where beauty and eloquence were prominently displayed.

The house of representatives is the lounging place of both sexes, where acquaintance is as easily made as at public amusements. And the drawing-room,--that centre of attraction,--affords the opportunity of seeing all those whom fashion, fame, beauty, wealth or talents, have render'd celebrated.

Cooley described attendance at the Capitol "to hear the debates in [C]ongress, and the pleadings in the [S]upreme [C]ourt of the United States," as "customary and fashionable." The "most fashionable ladies" arrived after one o'clock, and no respectable gentleman refused his seat for a lady."252

Discussion over the admission of Missouri drew "not less than a hundred ladies" to the floor of the Senate, according to Sarah Seaton.253 When Vice President Daniel Tompkins invited a group of ladies to take seats on the floor of the Senate, the observers in the gallery deserted their seats and streamed on to the floor to claim the "sofas" and foot-stools. The next day Tompkins placed a note on the chamber's door "excluding ladies not introduced by one of the Senators."

Historian Lori Ginzberg has found that the "higher a woman's status [was] the more access she had to politicians"; for women of high social status--elites--legislators and city council members were reasonably accessible throughout the antebellum period. Recently in Women in Public: Between Banners and Ballots, 1825-1880 historian Mary P. Ryan explored the distinctions between public and private behavior. Despite their inability to vote or own property, Ryan demonstrates how women staged public ceremonies, and by utilizing the power of petitions, some women even influenced public officials. For women once restricted to the private realm of their households, the nineteenth century rise of urban culture signaled their movement into public arenas. Simply living in Washington, placed women in the public arena of the political society.

Washington's elite women did not limit themselves to the superficialities of society. Washington was a political city where the wives of government officials came daily into contact with some of the most important figures in the United States. Some husbands tried to keep their wives appraised of political events even when they were not in Washington. Samuel Latham Mitchell wrote wife Catharine:

You must remember, too, that you are one of my constituents, and that I am in some degrees responsible to you for my public conduct. In the theory of our Constitution women are calculated as political beings. They are numbered in the census of the inhabitants to make up the amount of population, and Representatives are apportioned among the people according to their numbers, reckoning the females as well as the males... You formerly had a Representative in the House of Representatives to yourself, and latterly (oh, the nature of woman!) you have actually become possessed of a Senatorial vote which is half the weight of the commonwealth in the other branch of Congress. Considering you thus as one among the sovereign people, I have thought it proper from time to time to give you an account of my behavior, hoping thereby to keep you in a good humor and to conciliate and perpetuate your favorable opinion. Hitherto in the course of my correspondence I have always referred to our social and conjugal relation. I now write to you in [your] sovereign and political capacity, and pay you therein the homage of my dutiful respects.\(^256\)

Mrs. Mitchell, like other political wives, was well aware of political happenings in Washington. Indeed, as Congress debated the war question behind closed doors in 1812, Catharine Mitchell learned of the discussions through boardinghouse conversations.

I might indeed, have informed you what my conjectures were, and this information would have been as correct as that of any person who was not a member of congress, and perhaps rather more so, for to say nothing of my Husband, I find out so m[any] of their secrets from the conversations of the Gentlemen who board in the house with me. They come home after being shut up all day, full of the subject they have had before them, and talk it over very freely in my presence without considering that they are letting the Cat out of the Bag. . . . It is a difficult thing to keep the congressional proceedings a secret, for what one party does not communicate the other will, and you would laugh to see the prying curiosity of people whenever the doors are closed. It was well known all over the City what congress had been doing before the injunction of secrecy was taken off.

Congressional wives were not the only ladies privy to state secrets. Dolley Madison may have protected her husband's secrets from the ears of his political adversaries, but with her family she shared important confidences. When separated from sister Anna, Dolley Madison kept the Cutts informed of the political situation surrounding the war of 1812. In one letter Mrs. Madison pointedly asked her sister where Cutts' boats were, and why he had not brought them in, thus warning Anna of the impending British embargo, information that had not yet been released to the public. In another correspondence She recounted, "I wrote you that the embargo would take place three or four days before it did, dear Anna."

Madison also told Anna that she hoped Mr. Cutts would arrive in Washington in time to vote for the war.\textsuperscript{259} Correspondence such as that between the Mitchills and Dolley Madison and Anna Cutts may have helped disseminate political news to the rest of the country, for mail was far from private during this time.

Evening calls often developed into political discussions in which women also participated. Following an evening of "social chat... [and] a surfeit of politicks" with Representative Joseph Hopkinson (F, PA), Louisa Adams sardonically noted that the discussion failed to "heighten [her] sentiments of admiration" for those playing Washington's "leading game"—politics.\textsuperscript{260} While playing chess with Presidential candidate William Crawford, Margaret Bayard Smith suggested that they pretend their game was "the presidential game." Crawford selected Adams, which left Mrs. Smith with Jackson. "Stale mate" represented Crawford. Of five games 'Adams' won three, and as time would tell, their game foretold the election's outcome.

Political maneuvers of the petticoat politicians included congressional wives lobbying their husband's messmates upon the behalf of revolutionary war widows—as did Catharine Akerly Mitchell—or organizing theater expeditions—as did Margaret Bayard Smith. After Congressman Samuel Latham Mitchill's petition on behalf of Mrs. Selah Benton—the widow of a naval captain—was sent to a select committee, Catharine began her lobbying. Samuel believed that she would "have more influence with congressional Gentlemen than one of their own sex." Thus Catharine sent Mrs. Benton with a note of introduction to Representative Thomas Gholson, Jr. (R, VA), chairman of the Committee on Claims, to plead her case. Mrs. Benton got the pension, and according to Catharine, "all the Gentlemen who live in the house [Claxton's during the Twelfth Congress] with me (except one) voted for the Bill."261

The election of 1825 found women showing their support for the candidate of their choice—Adams, Calhoun, Crawford or Jackson. After Louisa Adams and Floride Calhoun amassed large groups of people to go to the theater to demonstrate support for their husbands—candidates for the Presidency—Margaret Bayard Smith and her friends decided that Mrs. Crawford should also arrange such a party. Accordingly, after collecting "10 ladies and above 20 gentlemen," Mrs. Smith called upon Louis McLane, who "said we should have as many members as we wanted, he and Mr. Van Buren would muster them and take the box." Their efforts resulted in "an overflowing house. . .[and] with but a few exceptions, [the patrons were] all Crawfordites." Mrs. Adams, Mrs. Calhoun and Mrs. Smith each understood the necessity of campaigning, of making a public display of their support of a candidate.

Like women in the rest of the United States, women in Washington responded to the spread of poverty. Following the War of 1812, a group of ladies met to organize the Washington City Orphan Asylum, an institution to care for the widows and orphans who flocked to Washington, seeking relief. As "the first institution for children's welfare in the city and thought to be only the third such organization in the country," the asylum drew on community support. Marcia Burns Van Ness remained the moving force behind the institution until her death in 1832. As the daughter of David Burns, one of the greatest proprietors of land in Washington, and wife of the wealthy John P. Van Ness, a former Congressman from New York, Marcia had the means to finance such a venture. She and her husband donated land for the asylum’s benefit, and John Van Ness lobbied Congress for additional support. Other ladies who joined in the effort included Dolley Madison, Mrs. Obadiah Brown, Mrs. Hunter, Margaret Bayard Smith, Mrs. Blake, Mrs. Nathan Towson, and Mrs. McGowan. These ladies also accepted subscriptions in support of their efforts, and as shown through Asylum records, members of Congress and their wives contributed regularly.266

The asylum provided orphans the opportunity to obtain a basic education, as well as learning basic household skills. When possible the asylum placed its charges in the homes of respectable citizens, where they earned their keep by helping with the housework. In 1822, the ladies of Washington held a fair to benefit the institution. Margaret Bayard Smith donated a manuscript, What is Gentility?, of which 100 copies were printed and auctioned off at the fair. Other ladies sold dolls, pin-cushions, stockings, hats, caps, tables, and dresses. Mr. Carusi donated his assembly room for the event, and the Marines from the Marine Barracks helped decorate and provided the music.

Mrs. Smith's book, a didactic novel of instruction, revolved around the lives of a nouveau riche family, the McCartys, and their quest for happiness and gentility. "The purport of this little work," wrote Margaret Bayard Smith, is to demonstrate, that gentility is independent of birth, wealth or condition, but is derived from that cultivation of mind which imparts elevation to sentiment and refinement to manners in what ever situation of life they may be found; knowledge acting upon character, as fire upon gold, purifying it from any base or gross admixture.

Essentially, Margaret Bayard Smith advanced the idea that although money might make life easier, respectability and gentility could not be purchased; they resulted from education. Her novel clearly demonstrates what historian John Kasson called "the rise of popular gentility."

The story follows both the McCarty family and their quest for gentility and Colonel Lenox, "a poor but shrewd man," and his daughter, Maria. After she completes her studies at a first rate boarding school, Colonel Lenox brings Maria to Washington, hoping to marry her to a respectable gentleman. He then selects "lodgings, in a noted fashionable boardinghouse," so that they would be where "the most wealthy and fashionable members of Congress boarded."

Shopkeeper Tim McCarty and his wife want the best for their children. While they offer their elder son Timothy the opportunity to attend college, he has no interest in learning and passes the honor to the younger son, Charles, who is sent to Princeton; daughter Catherine goes off to a fashionable boarding school, where she meets Maria Lenox. With his siblings at school, Timothy encounters a German cabinet-maker and his daughter, and begins studying music with the old man. When the McCarty children return, Charles is a bookish boor and Catherine a superficial snob. Charles does not find comfort in the society which his sister aspires to, and begins taking an interest in his parents. Catherine introduces Timothy to Maria Lenox, who believes him to be wealthy. Maria Lenox, a pretentious, ambitious woman, weds Timothy McCarty, and a miserable marriage results. Only after Maria dies in childbirth does Timothy realize that only with his true love, the daughter of the German cabinet-maker, will he find fulfillment. Charles marries a simple but loving woman, and through hard work obtains a foreign diplomatic post.

Margaret Bayard Smith's moral admonition that gentility and true education come only through experience and moral living was an apt choice for the Asylum's fair, in so far as she and the other ladies of the orphan asylum believed that through education and hard work, the orphans could become productive citizens. As John F. Kasson discovered nineteenth century Americans believed that, "with proper drive, knowledge, and success, an individual or family might climb the social ladder to new heights."

What is Gentility? exemplifies Kasson's observation.271

Several of Washington's elite women left behind papers that enrich the history of the federal city and contribute significantly to an understanding of the workings of polite

Little information remains on the early years of the Washington City Orphan Asylum. The Washington City Orphan Asylum has continued into the twentieth century as the Hillcrest Children's Center. Lori Ginzberg's Women and the Work of Benevolence: Morality, Politics, and Class in the Nineteenth-Century United States (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1990) discusses the manner in which women used benevolent work and the rhetoric of female moral superiority to further middle and upper class causes. In her first chapter Ginzberg addresses the credo of female moral superiority and women's Christian duty. Of the papers examined, none discusses either moral reformation or benevolent work. That they organized and supported the Orphan Asylum suggests that Washington's middle and upper class women were part of the moral reform movement that swept the country during the 1830s and 1840s. Further research may reveal how involved they were.
society. While most of their correspondence details social events, other letters and diary entries show that these women enjoyed reading, appreciated art, followed the political debates, and ran their households. All of these women had domestic help, some slaves, others servants, and most of them raised children. Among the long-time Washingtonians, Marcia Burns Van Ness, Margaret Bayard Smith, and Anna Thornton spent the majority of their adult lives in Washington. The following section provides a brief overview of some of Washington’s most notable women.

Margaret Bayard Smith balanced the roles of wife, mother, novelist and social leader. Among her known works, What is Gentility? and A Winter in Washington contain telling portraits of the society in which Mrs. Smith lived. Both novels of instruction, these books also contain descriptions of actual people and events. For example, the Seymour family of A Winter in Washington was admittedly based on the William Wirt family:

272 Although Ann Ogle Tayloe spent considerable time in the city--at the Octagon--her correspondences at the Virginia Historical Society were not examined. Cost and distance also precluded an examination of Marcia Van Ness’s papers at the New York Public Library. The papers of Susan Decater and her sister Mrs. Bomford also proved elusive, as did the papers of Eliza Custis Law and most congressional wives. Correspondences between members of Congress and their wives, as suggested by the wealth of information culled from the Harrison Gray Otis, Levi Woodbury, Samuel Latham Mitchell and Louis McLane Collections can provide incredible insights not only into the social and political life of the early republic, but also into the lives of political wives and their roles both alone at home, and in Washington.
The domestic habits, style of living, and character of this family, come nearer to my beau-ideal, than that of any other I know. I have Endeavored to describe it, in my Seymour family; for you know Mr. Wirt was the model of my Mr. Seymour.273

A children's story, The Diversions of Sidney, discusses the moral instruction of a young girl, Julia, and was probably written for her own daughter, Julia. Margaret Bayard Smith also wrote a short biography of her good friend Dolley Madison for The National Portrait Gallery of Notable Americans.

Margaret Bayard Smith and her sister Maria Bayard Boyd attended the Moravian Seminary of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, as did Catharine Akerly Mitchell, where they studied English, German, and arithmetic, in addition to sewing and religion.274 During the early years of her marriage, Margaret Bayard Smith enjoyed the festivities of the social set. Like Anna Thornton and Dolly Madison, Margaret Bayard Smith as she grew older found contentment away from the whirl of society. At Sidney, her country home, Mrs. Smith enjoyed the leisure time freedom from daily calls afforded her. Despite the assistance a staff of servants afforded her, Mrs. Smith took pride in butter-making and other domestic tasks.\(^{275}\) Although few of the women studied discuss their household maintenance, Margaret Bayard Smith does give some insights into the management of her household. In a letter to her sister-in-law, Susan Smith, Margaret once wrote that she would much prefer a stormy day in the country, with Susan to read to her while she worked, to the throngs of society. Nevertheless, after spending a year in the country because of a shortage of income, Margaret was happy to regain a place in the city.\(^{276}\)

Unlike Margaret Bayard Smith, Anna Maria Thornton had no children. Mrs. Thornton’s diaries, though riddled with abbreviations and brief, often cryptic notations, remain a wonderful synopsis of her world. Her close friends included Dolley Madison, Margaret Bayard Smith, Madame Pinchon (wife of the French Minister), Mrs. Anthony Merry (wife of the British Minister), the William Cranch family, and Louisa Adams’ family, the Johnsons. Mrs. Thornton frequently escorted the young daughters of her friends to balls, and often invited her friends to tea. One historian found that during a six month period in 1803, Mrs. Thornton

"attended or hosted sixty-one teas, nineteen dinners, four parties, and one ball."²⁷⁷

Mrs. Thornton enjoyed singing, visiting, reading and painting, and while she acted as escort for various belles from time to time, she did not have the domestic responsibility of raising children. Mrs. Thornton assisted her husband by writing patents and finishing his architectural drawings, as well as keeping their household accounts. Her leisure time activities included visits to the theater, calling on friends, reading novels, and playing chess, backgammon, whist, or loo, often with her husband and friends. Mrs. Thornton attended the horse races; her husband raised, bred, and invested heavily in horses.

Anna Thornton also owned property, which she inherited from her mother, and managed the profits of their farm, two hours distant from Washington. While Mrs. Thornton's church attendance was irregular, she attended different types of services, including a Catholic service. She and William Thornton were very fond of each other, and during Washington's early years, the Thorntons took frequent walks to see the new construction in the city. As two of the federal city's longest residents, the Thornton's saw many of their friends move away, and others die. Dr. Thornton's death in 1828 left Mrs. Thornton very much alone; she remained, however, in Washington until her death in 1865.

Both Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Thornton recorded the names of their visitors. Among them are listed Dolley Madison, Susan Erskine, Ann Clay, Floride Calhoun, Susan Decatur, Ann Tayloe, Hannah Gallatin, Madame Bonaparte, Catharine Mitchell, Kitty McLane, Eleanor Wirt, Louisa Adams, Eliza Law, and countless others. As constants in the endless stream of visitors to the federal city, these women saw the infant city grow, burn, and rise from the ashes to become a city of which the country was growing increasingly proud. Along with women like Louisa Adams, Catharine Mitchell, and Elizabeth Woodbury, through their correspondences, Margaret Bayard Smith and Anna Thornton kept people far from Washington appraised of things both social and political. None of these women expressed guilt or feelings of awkwardness for their interest either in politics or in literature.

Rosalie Stier Calvert's experience differed greatly from Washington's other elite women. Despite her residence at Riversdale, a plantation approximately six miles from Washington, D. C. she was part of what might be considered an extension of Washington's elite society. Rosalie's ownership and financial management of a plantation was highly unusual during a time when most states prohibited women from owning property.
As a young wife, Rosalie participated in Washington society and maintained intimate friendships with Eliza Custis Law and her sisters Martha Custis Peter and Eleanor Custis Lewis. Rosalie's letters to her family in Belgium contain descriptions of Washington's physical improvements, as well as social gossip. Despite her acceptance within elite society, Rosalie often felt lonely. She despised the emphasis placed by society on money and possessions. To her mother, Rosalie confided:

Each day I realize more and more that happiness is only to be found in one's family. Although I go out in society more and play a more distinguished role than I have ever done before, nevertheless I am continually disgusted by the maliciousness and the lack of sincerity I meet here. . . . I can find pleasant acquaintances here, but I have not yet found anyone who could be my friend, either man or woman.

Separation from her family was difficult for Rosalie, and while the Washington social scene helped ease her loneliness for a time, the stress of child-bearing and the financial constraints of plantation-life limited Rosalie's social life after 1805. Rosalie made butter, which she sold for a quarter a pound, and wove cloth for servants'.

clothing. By 1806 Rosalie had had four children and added the role of school teacher to her duties. In 1816 Rosalie and George Calvert held a week long open-house to display Henri Stier's collection of European art, before sending the works back to Europe. 1816 also marked the birth of Amelia, Rosalie's ninth and final child.

In addition to child-rearing and running her household, Rosalie kept the accounts for her husband's plantations, managed her father's extensive American investments, and she also served as a tobacco broker. Despite the fact that an 1816 act of the Maryland legislature vested ownership of Riversdale in Rosalie Calvert and her heirs, George Calvert still had to sign some legal documents for Rosalie because Maryland laws "did not provide for a married woman to engage in financial transactions." George Calvert's endorsements were a simple legal formality; Rosalie made her own financial decisions.

hours, the Calverts limited their social engagements "to two or three evenings a week."\textsuperscript{284} For two years the Calverts enjoyed the Washington social scene. Then in 1820 two more of their children passed away, and a year later Rosalie died. While Rosalie was a part of Washington’s extended elite society, her plantation experiences and her separation from her family set her apart from her contemporaries.

Divorce was an uncommon occurrence in early Washington. One divorced woman who remained an accepted member of elite society was Eliza Custis--Martha Washington’s granddaughter--who married Thomas Law in 1796. Eliza was depicted as a bright, spirited, and spoiled woman, and her husband a brilliant but eccentric man. From her youth, Eliza exhibited a precocious spirit that her stepfather David Stuart tried to control. When Eliza made known her desire to learn Greek and Latin, Stuart ended her schooling, because of his belief that "mending, writing, arithmetic and music" were all a lady "could be permitted to acquire."\textsuperscript{285} sensitivity. . . ." Rosalie later described Eliza as rather self-important.

Since childhood, Mrs. L. demonstrated a violent and romantic disposition. Her father recognized that her singular personality would bring her unhappiness and he tried to correct it, but he died while she was still very young. . . . When Mrs. L. entered society, she was very pretty, rich and quite intelligent. Her relatives and connections were the most respectable. Consequently, she was greatly admired and flattered. She never cared about the compliments she was given on her beauty, but she was always very vain about her mind and knowledge. After rejecting some brilliant offers, she married Mr. L. whom you know well, against the wishes of all her relatives.

In 1800, Margaret Bayard Smith and her husband called on the Laws. Joining them for dinner were Captain Tingey and family, as well as Eliza Law's brother-in-laws, Mr. Thomas Peter and Mr. Lewis. Of this occasion, Mrs. Smith noted, "I have never met with any one so destitute of all form or ceremony as this sweet woman." Recalling the same visit, Mrs. Smith recounted that Thomas Law was impossible to describe. . . he is one of the strangest I have ever met with, all good nature and benevolence; his ruling passion is to serve every one, which keeps him perpetually busy, about others. Scarcely a day passes without his calling, and at all hours; the other morning he was almost in our room before we were up."

The early happiness of the Laws did not survive. They had but one daughter prior to their divorce in 1806. Neither remarried.

Never were two people less suited to live together, but during the life of her grandmother, Mrs. Washington, to whom she was most attached, they restrained themselves in order to spare her pain. After [Mrs. Washington’s] death, Mr. L. went to England and soon after his return they decided to separate. Never was anything stranger because they only reproach each other about their manners and dispositions. Mrs. L.’s biggest fault is that she has such a high opinion of herself that she is contemptuous of everyone else. 288

The Laws’ divorce was public knowledge, and though Eliza moved to Alexandria and later Philadelphia, and Thomas remained in the Washington area, neither was castigated.

Mrs. Law and her husband separated amicably. I believe this is the most peculiar affair of this sort, that has ever taken place. They don’t accuse each other of anything except not being able to get along together. You know he has always been a little crazy, and I think she is too. 289

Although Thomas Law retained custody of their daughter, Ann, which was typical for the time period, she was sent to boarding school in Philadelphia, where her mother resided. Ann Law made a good marriage to Lloyd Nicholas Rogers, a gentleman from Baltimore, and died young. Both Thomas and Eliza Law, like Betsy Patterson Bonaparte, remained accepted among the socially elite. Perhaps the foundation of their family reputations helped the Laws and Madame Bonaparte avert society’s scorn, perhaps society considered both cases matters of circumstance—or possibly these situations were acceptable to Washington society.

Women were an important part of the Washington Community throughout the period 1800-1830. Parties, teas, private dinners, and public assemblies were as much political gatherings as were sessions of Congress. For the elite women of Washington, theirs was an environment of power and privilege, and although their society followed proscribed rules, these women had free access to most federal officials. As suggested through the actions of Dolley Madison, Louisa Adams, Margaret Bayard Smith, and Catharine Mitchell, some of the elite women in Washington used their social positions for political ends. Other more transient women of the political elite simply came to the city to be with their husbands, and to take advantage of social life in the national metropolis.

241 See Appendix C for a list of elite and congressional wives in Washington by congressional session.
Those who had been "strangers in a strange land" in 1800 had become the vanguards of the capital city's elite society, by 1830. As with the men of the Washington messes, the elite women who came to Washington formed friendships that continued beyond their residence in Washington. These long term residents among whom Margaret Bayard Smith, Anna Maria Thornton, Marcia Van Ness, Dolley Madison and Louisa Catherine Adams had come to the city as young wives, were in 1830, mature women. For the social engineers of this unique political community events ranging from informal teas to theater parties became political events. With all the diversions the federal city offered, entertaining eventually proved tiresome, nevertheless these ladies continued make their expected calls. In her seminal work The Bonds of Womanhood, historian Nancy Cott argues that the bonds of womanhood "bound women together even as much as it bound them down," a statement which holds true for Washington's elite women.292

CONCLUSION

This study evolved from the simple premise that James Sterling Young's view of Washington City was flawed. Three questions guided the research for this project: How did Washington change over time? Why did members of Congress choose specific boardinghouses? What role did elite wives play in the emerging Washington community? Young's view of Washington and its community was too simplistic. The elite community of Washington was, by definition, a political community, although the nature of that community changed substantially between 1800 and 1830. Young neglected to address how Washington changed from 1800 to 1828.

Physically, the population of Washington City grew from 2,464 to 18,826; the Capitol and the President's Palace, which the British burned in 1814, had been built anew by 1830. Assorted merchants and milliners offered goods comparable to those for sale in other major cities. Washington was not planned, as James Sterling Young wrote, to be a "government at a distance and out of sight;" the spectacle of politics at Washington city drew people from all over the country and indeed, people from all over the world very early in the city's history.293

and hotels provided both accommodation and the opportunity to develop close friendships with other like-minded individuals. Members of Congress chose a particular mess for simple reasons like location and comfort, or for more complex ones, such as the politics or sectional origins of the other boarders. Other considerations, including friendship and the presence of relatives in the city, also affected their selections. Within the various congressional residences, conversations often focused on politics. Wives and other non-congressional guests relayed political dinner table talk, and leisure time gossip to their friends and relatives in their home states. In a hotel, a member of Congress could dine at the public table, in a private room, with a mess, or within his own chambers, or he could choose to eat at an oyster house or similar establishment. Within public hotels, some individuals found anonymity. Most messes consisted of members of the same parties and from the same regions. Those individuals who chose hotels over boardinghouses did so because hotels afforded them more opportunities for politics, business, socializing, privacy or all four of these considerations.

Most members took advantage of the diversions of the city in their spare time. Levees, balls, and horse races brought Senators, members of Congress, diplomats, and cabinet officials into contact with other members of the society. On the whole, life in boardinghouses and hotels, much like life in fraternal organizations, provided members the opportunity to establish important friendships. These relationships contributed to government stability, as several of these men remained in Congress for several terms, and others moved from branch to branch. Men like William Crawford, John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, George W.
Campbell, and John Quincy Adams served in Washington for more than ten years both as legislators and as cabinet members. Contrary to Young's belief that Washington was a place from which public servants fled, Washington soon became a magnet for the politically ambitious.

Like the city and Congress, the elite community also changed. The youthful brides and their ambitious husbands who came to Washington in 1800 were middle aged in 1830.
Those who had been "strangers in a strange land" in 1800 had created a dynamic society, in which some elite women influenced the men who shaped national policies.294 Increasingly, however, the elite women of early Washington's permanent society felt isolated as their husbands and friends either passed away or left the political community.295 Their reign within the political society would come to an end over the ensuing decade. An exactig etiquette had eclipsed the informality of the early Washington community. Gone were the informal dinners of Thomas Jefferson. With 213 members of Congress and forty-eight Senators crowding the capital city, standing invitations to private parties could no longer be issued. Despite the elite's contention that theirs was a democratic society, they had created a privileged and largely aristocratic society. They were genteel, and so did not have to learn the manners of gentility. As the John Quincy Adams' administration prepared to vacate Washington, Margaret Bayard Smith wrote:

I look upon life as a stage, and on men and women as mere actors. One drama is just finished, the curtain has dropped, the actors have just left the stage and I have followed them behind the scenes, where their masks and dresses are thrown off and I see them as they are, disappointed, exhausted, worn out, retiring with broken constitutions and hearts rankling with barbed arrows.

Another drama is preparing. New characters, in all the freshness and vigour of unexhausted strength, with the exhilaration of hopes undaunted by fear, of spirits intoxicated with success, with the aspirations of towering ambition are coming on the self-same stage. Will public favour cheer their closing, as it inspires the opening scene? Time must show, but most probably, they in turn will drink the cup of honour to the bottom and find its dregs nauseous and bitter.296

Genteel Washington reached its peak during the mid-1820s. Although the community grew during its first twenty years, it remained for the elites an intimate, close-knit community. The election of 1828 dramatically changed the Washington community. In 1828, Andrew Jackson, "the people’s president," become the seventh president of the United States. After his inauguration, Jackson opened doors of the president’s palace to his subjects, which resulted in the destruction of "several thousands [of] dollars" of china and cut glass. The crowd was so large that windows were thrown open for people to escape, and Jackson himself fled the premises for the safety of his lodgings at Gadsby’s hotel. Months later, the Eaton affair fractured elite society, as the wives of Messers Berrien, Branch, Calhoun, as well as the diplomatic corps, refused to invite Mrs. Eaton to their homes. The elite women of Washington united against Mrs. Eaton and made a matter of etiquette a matter of politics. In the next decades etiquette manuals as well as philanthropic organizations and antislavery associations would change middle class society, as well as the Washington political community.

301 The proprietor of the house is listed followed by the number of the congress. The house address follows two dashes. Street names are abbreviated as are addresses and landmarks. Thus "CH" = Capitol Hill, "AV" = Avenue, "Cntr Mkt" = Centre Market, "Htl" = Hotel, "btw." = between, "Brwn Htl" = Brown’s Hotel, "PR" = Private Residence, "NVY" = Navy, etc. Maps at the end of this appendix shows the configuration of houses for the Tenth, Sixteenth, and Twenty-first Congresses.

Party affiliation is the first designation following the surname. Contested elections are noted by the use of "c", territorial delegates are labeled "del." and Senators are labeled with a "s" following the party designation. State identifications follow the party affiliations. Congressional sessions—normally 1 or 2—follow party notations. For an explanation of party designations, see note 1 in Appendix A.
